But compare Meyer v. O'Rourke, 150 Cal. 177, 88 P 706 (in the absence of a specific statute authorizing the imposition of costs against executors, costs will be imposed upon an executor individually, leaving him the right to seek reimbursement from the estate should he be fairly entitled to it).

[a] Where a suit commenced against decedent is continued by the court against his personal representatives, plaintiff is entitled to costs against the estate if the verdict is such that he would have recovered costs if defendant had not died. Benedict v. Caffe, 10 N. Y. Super. 669.

[b] Where while living, the original defendant suffers default and interlocutory judgment, the estate should be charged with costs, on letting the administrators in to plead after his death. Lefevere v. Van Vechten, 3 HowPr (N. Y.) 201.

[c] Presumption as to liability.—Costs awarded to a plaintiff in an action against an executor will be presumed to be payable out of the estate and not by the executor personally in the absence of proof. Berwick v. Halsey, 4 Redf. Surr. (N. Y.) 18.

[d] Suit to recover legacy.—Where a suit to recover a legacy is rendered necessary by the ambiguity of the will, the costs should be a general charge upon the whole estate and not upon the legacy. Sawyer v. Baldwin, 20 Pick. (Mass.) 378.

[e] Costs of appeals.—"We are satisfied that the respective appeals by the executor were prosecuted in good faith, and it was therefore not improper to order the costs occasioned thereby to be paid by the executor in due course of administration." Leischner v. Kaiser, 156 Ill. A. 123, 129.

[f] Insolvent estate.—Where the administrator of an insolvent estate in his hands are primarily liable for costs.[24] Where a suit is begun against executors without a presentation of the claim, and the executors find the claim to be just, and confess the demand within the time to appear and plead to the merits, there should be no judgment for costs.[25]

[§ 2285] (b) Special Statutory Provisions—aa. As to Time of Commencing Action. Under some statutes, a claimant who brings action within the time allowed for adjustment and settlement of claims is not entitled to costs, although successful in the action.[26]

[§ 2286] bb. As to Amount of Recovery. Under some statutes the right to costs is affected by the amount of recovery.[27] Thus where suit is brought against a personal representative on an allowed claim which has been allowed in part, plaintiff is sometimes denied costs unless he recovers more than the administrator was willing to allow,[28] and similar provision has been made with respect to the holder of a disputed claim against an estate which has been rejected and referred pursuant to statute.[29] Provision is also found that where personal representatives sue in the supreme court and recover less than an amount designated, they are not entitled to costs.[30] A statute which provides that plaintiff who recovers less than a designated amount in the circuit court shall be liable for costs does not apply to suits by an administrator who is by statute expressly empowered to sue for any sum in the circuit court.[31]

[§ 2287] cc. As to Presentation of Claim. Some statutes provide that one who successfully prosecutes a claim against an estate shall not recover costs unless he has presented his claim for allowance in accordance with the statutory provisions,[32] and other statutes make plaintiff liable for costs in case of nonpresentation.[33] These statutes have been held not to apply to actions against the personal representative when sued jointly with coöbligors of the deceased upon joint and several contracts;[34] or to cases in which the statute of nonclaim is immaterial and in which due presentment could not have avoided litigation.[35] If defendant intends to raise the question of presentation he must present it on the record by plea or suggestion so that plaintiff may have an opportunity of proving the presentation and the issue must be tried by the jury;[36] if no such plea or suggestion is made and plaintiff has a general verdict on the issue joined, he is entitled to full costs.[37] In order to recover costs it is not necessary for the declaration to allege a compliance with the statutory requirement as to presentation of the claims.[38]

[§ 2288] b. Suits in Equity. On a bill by an administrator de bonis non of a husband against the executor of the wife to set aside conveyances made by the husband to the wife in fraud of his creditors on a decree in favor of plaintiff he is entitled to recover costs against the estate of the wife.[39] Where an executor in good faith files a bill to foreclose a mortgage on land, securing a note absolute in terms, given to the testator, and the mortgagor successfully defends upon the ground that the mortgage was given as additional security for the payment of a chattel mortgage which has been paid, a decree for defendant canceling the mortgage will not be allowed to carry costs.[40] Where the answer to a bill of discovery filed by an executor shows that there was no fact within defendant's knowledge which could in any way aid the executor in his defense, costs are payable by the executor out of decedent's estate which has come into his hands.[41] In an action against heirs and administrators to compel specific execution of a contract of a decedent, where the heirs declare their readiness to lay title and the administrators admit assets on decree for plaintiff, the costs should be ordered paid by the administrators out of the assets.[42] Under a statute subjecting costs in chancery cases to the discretion of the court, except in a few cases it was proper in a suit brought in good faith to establish an equitable title in lands belonging to the estate to charge the estate with the taxable costs as part of the necessary expenses in the administration of the estate, although the relief prayed by the bill was denied.[43] Costs will not be awarded on a bill against executors of one who had purchased a bond and mortgage given for the purchase money of a trust estate sold by the trustee pending a suit against him for breach of trust, it not appearing that testator had actual notice of the suit against the trustee.[44] gives notice of his dissatisfaction with the amount awarded to a creditor by the commissioners, and the creditor recovers a larger sum than was awarded by the commissioners, he is entitled to judgment for costs against the administrator de bonis propriis. Burns v. Fay, 14 Pick. (Mass.) 8.

Not having done so, and the mortgage coming to the executrix of the mortgagee after his death, who, the executrix, knowing nothing about the original transaction, was justified in filing a bill to foreclose the mortgage, and should not be subjected to the payment of costs as the mortgagor succeeds only upon an affirmative defence").

[§ 2289] 3. When Personal Representative Entitled to Costs. Where the issue on the single plea of plene administravit is found for defendant, he is entitled to judgment for general costs in the case, notwithstanding judgment may be rendered in plaintiff's favor for his debt and costs to be levied on the goods of the estate quando acciderint.[46] It has been held that where the personal representative pleads the general issue and plene administravit and issues are joined on both pleas and judgment quando acciderint rendered, he is entitled to the general costs of the suit,[47] although there is also authority for the view that plaintiff is entitled to costs under such circumstances.[48] It has been held that where the representative pleads the general issue and plene administravit he will be entitled to costs on a judgment quando notwithstanding the plea of plene administravit is admitted,[49] but this has been denied in one case which holds that plaintiff is entitled to judgment for costs de bonis propriis,[50] and in another in which it is merely held that no costs should be adjudged to defendant.[51] A statute giving plaintiff costs if he recovers judgment has no application to a special statutory proceeding by an executor to recover property alleged to belong to his estate.[52] Executors who have no interest in the subject matter of the litigation, when made defendants, are entitled to costs,[53] and where an executor is sued as trustee and defends on the ground that he was liable only as executor, and that the probate court alone had jurisdiction and the court sustains the defense as to the greater part of the estate, it was held that he might be allowed a proportionate share of the expenses.[54] It has been held that where an executor demands securities of decedent from a trustee and exhibits a certificate of the surrogate showing that he is executor and the trustee refuses to deliver them until an accounting in court, the executor on obtaining judgment against the trustee for the delivery of the securities is entitled to judgment for costs.[55] Under statutes declaring that, if an executor refuses to pay a legacy, the person entitled thereto may maintain such action as the case requires, and providing that defendant is entitled to costs of course on final judgment in an action in which the complaint demands judgment for money only, an executor is entitled to costs on final judgment in his favor in an action brought against him, in which judgment is demanded for a certain sum, and the principal issue is whether or not the legacies claimed were revoked by a codicil.[56] In an action by remaindermen of personal property, charging misconduct, against the life tenant and another, executors, the remaindermen are properly charged with costs on failing to sustain the charges.[57] Where an administrator executed a mortgage on decedent's real estate under order of court to raise money to pay debts, and in a suit to foreclose such mortgage he successfully defended plaintiff's claim that he was personally liable thereon, the court properly awarded costs in his favor.[58]

Division of costs. Where an executor permitted an action to proceed as a suit to recover property after it was disclosed that defendant claimed title under an alleged gift, and plaintiff recovered only one item of the property, the court properly divided the costs.[59]

Withdrawal of replication to plea of plene administravit. Defendant may object to plaintiff's withdrawal by consent of court of the replication to the plea of plene administravit, unless on terms of plaintiff's payment of the costs occasioned by such replication, but if he neglects so to do at the time of withdrawal it admits that he is not entitled to recover such costs and there can be no judgment at any future term for his separate costs on account thereof if the issue of non assumpsit is found against him.[60]

[§ 2290] 4. Extra Allowance. Where costs have been properly awarded against an executor personally, an extra allowance against him will be allowed under proper circumstances,[61] as in extraordinary or difficult cases.[62] A motion for extra allowance when made before the right to recover the ordinary costs in the action has been determined is premature;[63] and where an action against an administrator in which plaintiff recovered judgment for a sum of money only was tried before a referee, there can be no extra allowance of costs until the cost allowed by the referee have been regularly taxed.[64]

[§ 2291] 5. Security for Costs. A foreign administrator may be required to give security for costs,[65] as may also a nonresident administrator,[66] although he brings suit as an administrator appointed within the jurisdiction.[67] The statutes sometimes leave it discretionary with the court in actions by or against personal representatives to require security for costs from plaintiff.[68] It is sufficient to authorize an order requiring security for costs to be given that the court considers it proper to require security,[69] and it is not necessary that there should be evidence of bad faith.[70] Security may be required at any time during the pendency of the suit either before trial or judgment or pending an appeal;[71] and the court may require security for costs already accrued or entered on the judgment appealed from as well as for those that shall thereafter accrue or limit the requisition to the costs which shall accrue in the future.[72] Statutes requiring security from a foreign administrator bringing suit have no application to one who is sued and chooses to defend.[73] The statutes do not apply to actions originally brought by decedent and revived in favor of his personal representative.[74]

[§ 2292] 6. Suits in Forma Pauperis. The privilege conferred by statutes allowing suits to be brought in forma pauperis is a personal one and an administrator cannot so sue on account of the insolvency of the estate;[75] much less can he do so where he would be the sole beneficiary of any recovery.[76]

[§ 2293] 7. Award of Costs. Sometimes, under statute, a defendant in a suit brought by an executor or administrator is entitled to costs without a motion where a successful defense is interposed;[77] but, where actions are brought against an executor or administrator and a judgment obtained, no costs can be recovered unless the court in the exercise of its powers upon motion adjudges that it is a case in which costs should be paid by the estate or its representatives.[78] So in actions prosecuted or defended by an executor or administrator a referee to whom the whole issue or cause is referred has not the right to decide the question of costs or the power to award costs against the executor or administrator personally or against the estate he represents;[79] such costs can only be allowed by the court upon application therefor [80] after trial.[81] The personal liability of an executor for the costs of an appeal in an action originally begun by the testator is not a matter for adjustment on the judicial accounting before the surrogate but must be determined by the court having original jurisdiction of the cause.[82] Under a statute providing for the appointment of an attorney to defend an action on a claim presented against an estate by the personal representative and that if plaintiff recovers no judgment he shall pay all costs including reasonable attorney's fees to be fixed by the court, a charge for services rendered by an attorney so appointed for services in the successful defense of such an action is not a part of the bill of costs and the fee therefor is to be fixed by the court.[83] The allowance of the fee can only be made after termination of the action.[84]

[§ 2294] 8. Judgment. Where the verdict is against a defendant as administrator judgment for costs must be entered against him in the same character,[85] but notwithstanding the fact that a judgment is erroneously rendered against an administrator for costs individually it is nevertheless effective until corrected on motion, on review, or on appeal.[86] Under various statutes it has been held that in order to charge the estate with costs the judgment must contain an express direction that the costs shall be payable out of the estate;[87] that where the court orders a judgment to be entered against an executor or administrator for costs without any special instructions, it means that the judgment shall be only de bonis testatoris, and there must be an express direction in the judgment to charge the personal representative individually for costs;[88] that the judgment, in order to charge the estate with costs, must contain a formal direction for the payment of costs out of the estate;[89] and that if it is sought to charge the administrator personally the judgment must expressly direct the costs to be paid by him personally for mismanagement or bad faith in the action.[90] Where by statute the personal representative is always individually liable for costs, a judgment against a designated person "as administrator," etc., is against him personally for costs.[91] A judgment for costs against the estate should not contain a direction that execution issue for the same, as execution can only issue when allowed by the probate court.[92]

[§ 2295] 9. Execution. Ordinarily where a judgment is rendered against a personal representative in his capacity as such for costs, execution cannot issue thereon but the costs should be certified to the probate court for allowance and payment in due course of administration.[93] If a judgment is against the personal representative for costs in his individual capacity, it is a money judgment and therefore enforceable only by execution,[94] which is therefore properly issued.[95] On a judgment of this character the property of an heir received from the estate is not liable to execution.[96] By the express provisions of the statutes in some jurisdictions where judgment is rendered against an executor for debt, or damages and costs, two separate executions issue, one for the debt or damages against the goods and estate of deceased and the other for the costs against the goods, estate, and body of the executor.[97] These statutes do not give the creditor a cumulative remedy in respect of costs but deprive him of his right to have an execution for costs against the goods and estate of deceased.[98] It has been held that an execution for costs issued against a personal representative warrants his arrest without affidavit or special instruction to the officer.[99]

[§ 2296] X. Attorneys' Fees and Other Expenses of Litigation. The allowance of attorneys' fees,[1] fees of witnesses,[2] stenographers' fees,[3] and disbursements,[4] in civil actions generally, have been treated elsewhere in this work.

Allowance to representative. Ordinarily in litigation by or against executors or administrators, where they employ counsel or stenographers, they are personally liable, although the litigation is for the benefit of the estate and is prosecuted or defended in their representative capacity, since they cannot bind the estate by any affirmative contract they may make respecting it.[5] Nevertheless one may agree not to hold the executor or administrator personally, and look to the estate only or to such allowances as may be made in the action or proceeding for his compensation,[6] and where a referee and an unofficial stenographer in a proceeding against administrators acquiesced in a stipulation between the parties that the referee's and stenographer's fees should be paid out of the estate, the administrators cannot be held personally liable therefor.[7] Where an administrator has control of the estate's funds and the right to reimbursement for all proper expenses and counsel fees in an action against him, the court in which an action against such administrator is brought cannot properly consider and determine the amount to be allowed for such expenses and counsel fees, and award such amount, to be taxed as a part of the costs, and to be allowed upon settlement of the administrator's account.[8] Allowances to an administrator for attorney's fees and court costs can be made only out of property belonging to the estate, and hence such fees and costs incurred in contesting a daughter's claim to the proceeds of an insurance policy, which are her own property, are not allowable.[9] Where an action is brought by an administrator, on a deficiency of assets, to set aside a fraudulent conveyance by decedent, the expenses of litigation, including attorney's fees, may be set aside out of the property fraudulently conveyed.[10]

Allowance to legatee claimant. In a suit by a legatee to enforce his claim against an executor and to reach real estate fraudulently conveyed, the court may not include in the claim of the legatee solicitor's fees,[11] although the legatee, as the original complainant, may be given such an allowance out of the recovery as against colegatees who intervened.[12]

Allowance to intervener. Where, in a suit by the executrixes of an estate, who claimed adversely thereto, being personally interested in the property involved, the interests of the estate were protected by the intervention of legatees thereof and the property claimed by the executrixes individually was added to the estate fund, the legatees were entitled to reasonable compensation for counsl fees and expenses out of the trust fund.[13]

Allowance to other claimants. It has been held that, where a disputed claim is referred and a report in claimant's favor confirmed, he is not entitled as matter of right to disbursements necessarily made by him, such as fees of referees, witnesses, etc.,[14] but they, as well as the costs, are to be awarded or withheld by the court in its discretion,[15] but other authorities hold that he is entitled to his disbursements as a matter of right.[16] If a claim based on a note containing a promise to pay attorney's fees is put in suit against an estate,[17] the claimant, if successful, is entitled to an allowance of the attorney's fees provided for therein.[18] Expenses and counsel fees reasonably incurred in litigation against the administrator which resulted in the recovery of a portion of the estate are a proper charge against it;[19] and attorney's fees are properly allowed to a widow in enforcing her claim against executors for an allowance under a will directing them to pay her an allowance to be determined by the court, in case of failure to agree on the amount.[20] In a suit to restrain an executor from paying illegal claims against the estate of his testator, complainant's attorneys may be paid out of the estate, where it is shown that the services rendered by them were in the interest of all the heirs alike, were beneficial to the estate, and were reasonably worth the sum allowed.[21] Where a bill for an accounting as to a bequest to trustees involved the issue whether complainants were testator's grandchildren, born of his son in lawful wedlock, which question had been determined against them in a prior suit in which they were unsuccessful, they would not be entitled to an allowance for counsel fees on the theory that the suit involved the inquiry whether complainants were entitled to a share in testator's estate under the trust provisions of his will, and accordingly involved the proper administration of the estate.[22]

[§ 2297] Y. Liabilities in Respect to Conduct of Action or Defense. The heirs and creditors of an estate are generally bound, in the absence of collusion or fraud, as far as third persons are concerned, by the acts of the personal representative in prosecuting or defending a suit concerning the estate,[23] although the representative may also be personally liable for damages caused by his wrongful acts, in the course of the proceedings,[24] unless it appears that he was disinterested and acted in good faith for the interests of the estate.[25] As between such heirs and creditors and the representative the latter is bound to act with diligence, prudence, and good faith, and unless he does so he may render himself personally liable for any loss occasioned by his negligence or bad faith in prosecuting[26] or defending[27] proceedings by or against him in his representative capacity, or in intervening in suits instituted between other persons.[28] The representative may be personally liable for a loss occasioned by his failure to record a judgment recovered by him[29] or to issue execution thereon.[30] But if he acts honestly and diligently he is not liable for failure to maintain an unjust[31] or useless[32] suit; or for a failure to insist on mere technicalities,[33] as for failing to plead in abatement,[34] or for omitting to appeal.[35]

[§ 2298] Z. Actions or Suits between Personal Representatives.[36] It is well settled as a general rule that one personal representative cannot maintain an action at law against another personal representative of the same decedent.[37] There are, however, some exceptions and limitations to this rule. Thus it has been held that an executor may maintain an action at law against his joint executor on an express promise,[38] and that an action may be maintained by an executor against one who has renounced,[39] or who does not accept the trust,[40] or who has been removed as executor.[41] One executor may sue another where questions arise between the estate and the derelict executor jeopardizing the rights of persons interested in the estate,[42] and where an executor or administrator refuses to or cannot properly join in a complaint, he may be made a codefendant.[43] After the settlement of the accounts, an executor, as heir at law or next of kin, may maintain an action against the coexecutor for the property belonging to the testator which has not been taken into the account before the surrogate.[44] In jurisdictions which have no courts of chancery, it seems that an administrator who has made a final settlement of the estate and paid the balance due from him to the persons entitled to receive it may bring an action against the estate of his coadministratrix who was also an heir for the amount received by her beyond her share;[45] he cannot, however, maintain such action before a final settlement of the administration account and while a portion of the estate remains in his hands.[46]

In equity the same considerations as govern in courts of law do not apply. Consequently one personal representative may maintain a bill in equity to compel payment of a debt due from defendant to the estate.[47] So it has been held that equity has jurisdiction of a suit by an executor against his co-

Va.—Rodes v. Rodes, 24 Gratt. (65 Va.) 256.

[a] Reason for rule. — "In the common law courts one executor, or administrator, cannot bring a suit against his co-executor, or co-administrator, to recover a debt which was due from the latter to the testator, or intestate. For each has the same right to the possession of the fund which belongs to both, as the representatives of the estate of which they are joint trustees. And the effect of a common law judgment, in favor of one against the other, would be to give the former the right to issue an execution and transfer the whole fund to his own exclusive possession. A court of equity, however, from its peculiar mode of administering justice, can settle the question as to the fact of indebtedness, and as to the amount due from one of the executors to the estate of which both are trustees, whenever the decision of this question becomes necessary, without changing the possession of the fund." But compare Beall v. Hilliary, 1 Md. 186, 54 AmD 649 (which seems to be in direct conflict with the rule stated in the text).

"The action is brought in equity, and the plaintiff seeks a judgment establishing the indebtedness of the respondent to the estate. That such an action may be maintained by one executor against a coexecutor is well settled. McGregor v. McGregor, 35 N. Y. 218; Rogers v. Rogers, 75 Hun 134, 27 NYS 276. In such an action the court, if it finds that the debt exists, can make proper provision by the decree for its payment and disposition. The Code does not require that a party who should be a plaintiff must be asked to become such before being joined as defendant. Its requirement is that: 'If the consent of one who should be joined as a plaintiff cannot be obtained he may be made a defendant the reason therefor being stated in the complaint.' Section 448, Code Civ. Proc. Undoubtedly the simplest way to determine whether a person will become a party plaintiff is to ask him; but it is not necessary to do so, when it appears that such a request would necessarily be futile." Wallach v. Dryfoos, 140 App. Div. 438, 125 NYS 305, 308.

[a] Reason for rule.—A court of equity, from its peculiar mode of administering justice, can settle the questions as to the fact of indebtedness and as to the amount due from one of the executors to the estate of which both are trustees whenever the decision of those questions becomes necessary without changing the possession of the fund. And when the amount of such indebtedness is ascertained the court may make such disposition of the fund as justice and equity shall then require. Smith v. Lawrence, 11 Paige (N. Y.) 206.

[c] An action to foreclose a mortgage against one who on the death of plaintiff pending the action qualifies as his executor may be revived and continued by the coexecutor. McGregor v. McGregor, 35 N. Y. 218.

[d] Where executors are directed to pay money into the estate and to pay a legacy to a coexecutor, but they failed to pay such money, such executor on a bill for services rendered the testator,[48] or of a suit by administrators against their coadministrators to ascertain and settle the amount due on a claim made by the coadministrator against the estate.[49] If one of several executors has been guilty of fraudulent misconduct in his dealings with the estate, his coexecutors may maintain a suit against him for an accounting.[50] A bill in equity may also be maintained for an account between the executors or administrators of different estates.[51] Where the managing executor and trustee of an estate obtained a portion of the property for his own use by committing a breach of trust and procuring the property to be conveyed to a corporation, in which he received a majority of the stock without consideration, and caused some shares of the stock to be transferred to plaintiff, his coexecutor, without consideration, none of the shares having been transferred to bona fide holders, plaintiff was entitled to disaffirm the transfer of the shares to himself and sue to have all the stock in the corporation declared the property of the executors and trustees.[52] Where a surviving partner and another are appointed administrators of the deceased partner's estate, a bill does not lie by the surviving partner against his coadministrator for a settlement of the affairs of the firm, as this amounts to taking a position on both sides of the case.[53] But where a special administratrix brought suit to set aside a deed executed by decedent to defendant, and to have the property decreed a part of decedent's estate, and subsquently a will of decedent naming plaintiff and defendant as executrix and executor was probated, and they qualified as such, and afterward the court substituted plaintiff in her capacity as executrix in place of herself as special administratrix, it was held that the action was maintainable, and defendant could not defeat it on the ground that he could not be sued because he was an executor.[54]

XV. ACCOUNTING AND SETTLEMENT

[§ 2300] B. Duty to Account—1. In General. An executor or administrator is bound to keep clear, distinct, and accurate accounts of his management of the estate, like any trustee, which accounts ought to be open in some way to the inspection of persons interested in the estate.[57] Upon the analogies of trusteeship, English courts of equity long exercised a jurisdiction in such matters; and hence, both in England and some of the older American states, creditors' bills have been entertained by way of bills of discovery against the personal representative, forcing him to set forth an account of the assets and the manner in which he has applied them.[58] But under modern statutes jurisdiction of such accounts is usually vested in courts of probate, and such probate jurisdiction includes, under appropriate legislation, the compulsion of a regular accounting by the executor or administrator of an coexecutor may sue in a court of equity in his individual right against the executors individually. Evans v. Evans, 23 N. J. Eq. 71.

[e] Necessity must appear. — A court of chancery will not interpose between executors unless it appears to be absolutely necessary for the purpose of justice. Rogers v. Moor, 1 Root (Conn.) 472.

[f] Adequate remedy at law.—On a bill filed by an executor against a coexecutor to recover a pro rata share of compensation and commissions allowed by the order of the probate court and paid to and retained by the coexecutor who refuses to pay over the share claimed by complainant, the remedy at law is plain and adequate, that no discovery is necessary and chancery has no jurisdiction. [a] A final settlement is a proceeding in which the amount of the residue subject to distribution is judicially determined and established by an order or decree of the court, but not the rights or shares of those who are entitled to it. Granger v. Bassett, 98 Mass. 462. Compare Ashley v. Ashley, 15 Ala. 15, 17 ("The material requisites therefore, of a final settlement are, first, that there be parties to it, whose rights are bound thereby; secondly, that those rights should be judicially ascertained, and established by the judgment of the court").

(59 Va.) 541 (where a widow and executrix having absolute estate for life or widowhood with power of appointment was required to account).

[c] A testamentary executor is not obliged to account to the heirs or legatees until the end of his administration; but nevertheless when all the assets have come into his hands he should furnish statements of account on demand. Quinn v. Fraser, 10 Que. 320.

[d] The province of the account is simply to show what the representative had received from the estate (and everything received is to be accounted for), and how much he has paid out on expenses and the debts of decedent. The balance remains for distribution. White's Est., 23 Pa. Super. 552.

[e] Estoppel to deny liability to account.—(1) Where an administrator files a final account showing that he has administered the estate, he is estopped to deny his representative character or liability to account. In re Osborn, 36 Or. 8, 58 P 521. estate.[59] Where no assets or personal property come into the hands of the executor or administrator he is not bound to render an account;[60] and it has been held that an administrator should not be required to file an account where it appeared that all the money which he had received since his former account was audited had been absorbed by the repayment of a sum which was found due to him at the audit of the first account and by counsel fees.[61] It has also been held that, where there are no creditors and the sole legatee is also executor an appropriation by him of the personal estate is an accounting which relieves the sureties from responsibility.[62] An order discharging an administrator who in his petition alleged that he had received no assets will be rescinded when it subsequently appears that assets have been received by him, and he will be required to account as to such assets as come into his hands.[63]

Upon the setting aside of a will, it is error for the court to order the executor to turn over to an administrator appointed all of the property in his possession belonging to the estate, without first affording to the executor an opportunity to state his account,[64] and under such circumstances an order requiring the executor to account is proper.[65]

Second account. When an account has been regularly filed in the proper place, a personal representative will not be compelled to file a second account[66] unless it is shown that the first is lost;[67] and it will be presumed that it is in the proper place until the contrary is shown.[68]

[§ 2301] 2. Periodical Accounting. Periodical returns are part of the American probate system, a first account being ordered within a stated time, and other accounts, from time to time, as the statute and the representative's bond may designate, until the estate is fully settled.[69] But partial accounts of representatives exhibited and allowed by the court will not prevent a person interested in the estate from bringing the representatives into court for a final settlement.[70]

[§ 2302] 3. Supplemental Accounting. It has been held that an executor or administrator who receives assets of the estate after he has filed an account should file a supplementary account thereof and may be compelled to do so,[71] but that it is only with respect to matters occurring after the settlement of their final account that representatives will be compelled to file supplementary accounts.[72] Under a statute providing that a statement of any receipts and disbursements of the executor or administrator since a rendition of his final account must be reported and filed at the time of making distribution, these statements may be settled at the time the decree of distribution is made, without notice,[73] or the court may order notice to be given and refer them for settlement.[74] Where the petition in an action to compel an executor to account after he has accounted and has been discharged fails to allege that any further sums came into the hands of the executor, and the executor specifically denies the receipt of any further sums, the accounting should be denied.[75]

Shrinkage of assets. Where there has been an unexplained shrinkage of assets between any two accounts, the representative will be ordered to file a further account explaining the apparent disappearance of assets.[76]

[§ 2303] 4. Time for Accounting. At common law an executor or administrator was not required to account at stated times, but only when cited for that purpose by the probate court at the instance of a person interested in the estate,[77] but at the present time it is usually provided by statute that a first account shall be filed within a certain time from the date of appointment, that other accounts shall follow at prescribed intervals, and that a final account shall be filed and settlement made at the expiration of a prescribed period.[78] Such statutes do not, however, prescribe a limit as to the obligation of the representative to account, but the probate court may require an accounting at any time,[79] and the statutes sometimes permit an action to settle an estate to be commenced at any time after the qualification of the executor or administrator.[80] The representative should account and settle up the estate as soon as this is reasonably possible,[81] but he should not make his final settlement before the expiration of the statutory period for filing claims,[82] and if he does so he and his sureties become liable to the creditors of the estate.[83] Neither can a final account be settled and approved so long as there are outstanding claims against the estate and property in the hands of the representative available for the payment thereof either in whole or in part.[84] Notwithstanding a statutory requirement for a final accounting and settlement after a certain length of time, such final accounting may be postponed as justice requires where delay occurs necessarily and without fault of the representative,[85] and it has been held that an executor or administrator ought not to be compelled to make a final settlement before the estate has been fully administered, with collections made and the debts and legacies paid.[86] But a settlement should not be postponed until the determination of an action to recover funeral expenses where the probate court has jurisdiction to determine the question of the reasonableness of such expenses.[87] A testamentary provision allowing more time than is specified by the statute for the settlement of the accounts of an executor has also been held binding on the legatees and devisees.[88] But the necessity for retaining funds to pay legacies becoming due at the death of testator's widow furnishes an executor no excuse for delaying settlement when he has in his hands a sum of money in excess of the legacies payable at such time.[89]

[b] Final accounting postponed by will.—Where a will made a bequest of an annuity for life to the testator's widow, the executor was not bound to render a final account until after her death. Rieman v. Peters, 2 Md. 104. See also Owens v. Pierce, 5 Lea (Tenn.) 462 (under the will an older child was not entitled, without alleging fraud, to an account with the executor, or to a distribution of the estate in whole or in part, until the youngest child became of age).

[c] After the lapse of seven years from the grant of administration, a final settlement should not be deferred at the instance of an administrator, because of outstanding debts or unsettled accounts. Ditmar v. Bogle, 53 Ala. 169.

[d] Limit of extension.—The time within which an administrator is required to close up an estate under the statutes of that state cannot be extended beyond the period of four and one-half years, during which period the creditors have a lien upon the realty belonging to the estate. Hoffman v. Beard, 32 Mich. 218 [dist Larzelere v. Starkweather, 38 Mich. 96].

A temporary administrator is required to account only when his office terminates by the qualification of the executor or the appointment of an administrator.[90] He has no right to make an intermediate accounting before such time,[91] nor should he be required to account pending an appeal in the proceedings which rendered his appointment necessary.[92]

[§ 2304] 5. Who Entitled to Require Accounting—a. In General. An accounting may be ordered on the application of any person having an interest in the estate and in the proper administration thereof,[93] and, conversely, it is necessary that it should appear that the applicant has such interest and is not a mere intermeddler.[94] It has been held, however, that, where an executor was Attwill v. Dole, 74 N. H. 300, 67 A 403.

[c] A receiver of an executor appointed in supplementary proceedings has not such an interest in the estate of the testator as entitles him to require the executor to account in order that the commissions due the executor may be ascertained and applied to the judgment. "The commissions due the executor from the estate not having been ascertained, on a proper accounting, it cannot be said that there is anything due him from the estate." Worrall v. Driggs, 1 Redf. [d] Estoppel.—(1) One who de-

also guardian of a minor child of decedent, although the child was old enough to exercise the right of choosing her own guardian, the court had discretion to entertain a proceeding instituted by a mere volunteer to compel the executor to make a final report and to make charges against himself as guardian.[95]

[§ 2305] b. Creditors. The right of a decedent's creditors to have the assets of his estate applied to payment of their debts constitutes such an interest as entitles them to call on the representative for an accounting.[96] It has been held that the right of creditors in this respect is not defeated by the fact that their claims were not presented within the time prescribed by the statute relating to the payment of claims, if the failure to present does not operate to bar entirely their right to payment,[97] or by the fact that their claims are barred by the general statute of limitations, where the personal representative has power to waive such bar.[98]

The creditors of a partnership in which the estate has an interest cannot require the personal representative to account, they not being creditors of decedent.[99]

A creditor of the personal representative, even though his claim arises out of expenses incurred by or services rendered to the latter in connection with the administration of the estate, is not entitled to demand an accounting.[1]

nies that he is interested in an estate may thereby estop himself from subsequently compelling the administrator to account. In re Rusko, 34 Hun (N. Y.) 334. (2) Where there were no debts, and decedent's son as administrator, by agreement with the widow and heirs, paid money into a partnership formerly owned by decedent and the son, and made no report for thirty years, there was an abandonment of administration, and the widow's administrator was estopped to call on the son as administrator to account except so as to show that all money received was paid to partnership. Close v. Shute, 4 Dem. Surr. (N. Y.) 546.

[h] Nature of proceeding.—A special proceeding by a creditor against a personal representative of a debtor for an accounting must be by summons and complaint in the first instance, and other creditors coming in need not file complaints unless their claims are denied, in which case they must do so. Isler v. Murphy, 76 N. C. 52.

[i] Further account at demand of creditor.—Where an executor or administrator has filed an account within the proper time, further accounts will not be ordered, "whenever the convenience or caprice of the creditor may demand. The contention that an estate can be paid out and wound up out of court and the creditors afforded no opportunity to scrutinize the proceedings on a final accounting has no foundation in law or equity. Matter of Gill, 183 N. Y. 347, 76 NE 274 [rev 101 App. Div. 607, 91 NYS 1095 (aff 42 Misc. 457, 87 NYS 252)].

[a] The assignee of a judgment recovered against an administrator for legal services rendered in the management of the estate cannot maintain an application for an accounting. Matter of Sayles, 57 Misc. 524, 527, 109 NYS 972 ("The petitioner has a personal judgment against one of the administrators of the Joseph I. Sayles estate, which is uncollectible, and its payment out of said estate is opposed. Such a judgment or claim does not bind the estate. Parker v. Day, 155 N. Y. 383, 49 NE 1046. Nor does it make the owner, in law, a person interested in the estate; or one entitled to maintain this proceeding under subdivision 3 of section 2514 of the Code of Civil Procedure, on the theory that such a claim is one 'for expense of administration'.").

Creditors of legatees or distributees are not, merely as such, entitled to demand an accounting,[2] even though their debts have been reduced to judgment.[3] But they may demand an accounting where they have seized or levied upon the interest of the legatee or distributee,[4] as where they have attached such interest.[5]

Cannot maintain bill in equity. An unsecured creditor having a mere legal demand which has not been reduced to judgment is not a cestui que trust in such a sense as to be entitled, in the absence of fraud, gross wrong, or unreasonable delay on the part of decedent's executor, to maintain a bill in equity in the federal court against such executor to compel an accounting.[6]

A personal representative who has been removed cannot be compelled to account on the petition of creditors,[7] unless the administrator de bonis non is insolvent or colludes with the debtors.[8]

[§ 2306] c. Heirs and Distributees. Heirs or distributees are persons interested who may require the executor or administrator to render an account of his administration,[9] and the exercise of this right is not dependent upon any charge of devastavit against the personal representative.[10] But in a case where the heirs and widow by agreement distributed all the estate, except certain stock, before the appointment of the administratrix, and the heirs had received their full share under the agreement, any remaining balance being more than offset by the expense of the administration, it was held that they could not require a further accounting.[11]

Where the entire estate is disposed of by will, an heir at law or distributee to whom nothing is given by the will is not entitled to require an accounting.[12]

One who has assigned or released his interest in the estate has been held to have the right to demand an accounting where he denies the validity of the assignment or release, because the probate court cannot try that question.[13] But there is also authority for the view that the probate court may determine the validity of the assignment, and if it is held valid will deny relief to the assignor;[14] and it has been held that where an heir brings suit against the personal representative for an accounting and to set aside releases of his interest in the estate to such representative, an accounting, which would involve an extensive and expensive investigation, should not be granted until the validity of the releases has been fully determined.[15]

titled to a decree for distribution;[18] but when he has received the full amount of his legacy he has no further interest and cannot thereafter demand an accounting.[19] A devisee, although not directly interested in the personalty, may, in cases where it is doubtful whether the personalty will be sufficient to satisfy the debts, have such an interest as will entitle him to demand an accounting,[20] especially if he is residuary devisee.[21]

A contingent interest in the estate is usually regarded as sufficient to support a demand for an accounting,[22] although it has been held that an interest so entirely contingent and uncertain that it may never have an actual existence does not give the right to require the executor to account.[23]

[§ 2308] e. Assignees or Representatives of Legatees or Distributees. The assignees[24] or personal representatives[25] of a legatee or distributee have the same right as the legatee or distributee had to demand an accounting. Where administrators are also the intestate's next of kin, a receiver appointed in supplementary proceedings against one of the administrators may compel an accounting and object to improper disbursements.[26] If the legatee or distributee died intestate, no one except his administrator has a right to demand an accounting from the personal representative administering the estate in which he was interested.[27] But it has been held that if such legatee or distributee has disposed of his legacy or distributive share by will, his legatee has an interest in the principal estate by virtue of which he may require the representative thereof to account.[28]

[§ 2309] f. Remaindermen. A remainderman whose rights in an estate are vested is so interested therein as to be entitled to apply to compel an executor to account, even though the owner of the life estate is also living and entitled to make similar application;[29] and this right has been held to exist, although the life tenant has the right to use both principal and income for specified purposes.[30]

[§ 2310] g. Coexecutors and Coadministrators. The right of a personal representative to compel his corepresentative to account is discussed elsewhere in this treatise.[32]

[§ 2311] h. Successors and Representatives. At common law, when an executor or administrator is removed, and an administrator de bonis non is appointed, the latter can only administer upon the estate which remains unadministered, and cannot call upon the removed executor or administrator to account;[33] but this rule has been very generally abrogated by statutory provisions under which an administrator de bonis non appointed upon the resignation or removal of an executor or administrator has the right to compel an accounting by his predecessor.[34] So also, in the absence of statute, it is usually considered that where an executor or administrator dies, his personal representatives cannot be compelled to account by the administrator de bonis non of the principal estate,[35] the right to demand such accounting being in the legatees and distributees only,[36] although in some states the rule, under statute, is that under such circumstances the administrator de bonis non is the proper person to compel an accounting.[37] It has been decided in New York that no statutory provision in that state authorizes the representatives of a deceased executor to initiate and conduct a proceeding for the accounting of their decedent in the estate whereof he was executor.[38]

[§ 2312] i. Sureties of Personal Representative. It has been held that sureties on the bond of an executor or administrator cannot compel an accounting by their principal;[39] but a surviving administrator may be compelled to account by a surety on the bond of his deceased coadministrator;[40] and it has been held that suit was properly brought by sureties of administrators against them and their successor to compel an accounting between the parties, to ascertain the amount of the estate, to ascertain the distributive shares of defendants as next of kin and apply the same to pay the damages caused by their default, to ascertain the amount thereof, and have a judgment entered against them in the first instance and plaintiffs decreed secondarily liable, and to enjoin their successor from prosecuting the bond.[41]

[§ 2313] j. Probate Court. The probate court, having jurisdiction of the estate, may on its own motion, and without application of any interested party, make an order citing the executor or administrator to render an account, after the lapse of the time fixed by statute or the bond of the representative.[42] Whether an order to account shall be made is a matter resting in the sound discretion of the court that it may be definitely ascertained what amount he should charge himself with in the latter.[75] An executor cannot be required to settle his accounts as such in a proceeding against him as guardian of an heir of the estate.[76]

[§ 2319] c. As Representative and Trustee. One who is testamentary trustee as well as executor holds the fund as executor until his final account as such is settled,[77] and he cannot properly assume the rights and duties of trustee until the court has approved his accounts as executor and ordered a distribution of the estate.[78] It has been considered that executors who are charged with trust duties should, when finally accounting as executors, include all their proceedings in the administration of the estate in whatever capacity they have assumed to act;[79] but it has also been said that blending accounts as personal representative and trustee is not permissible.[80] Where, in proceedings for the judicial settlement of his accounts as guardian, administrator with the will annexed, and testamentary trustee, it appeared that at all times since accountant had been concerned with the assets for which he sought to account he was only entitled to custody and administration of such assets as testamentary trustee, an account as administrator with the will annexed did not require adjustment.[81] An administrator who collects a trust fund belonging to the estate of his intestate and is subsequently appointed trustee of such fund is liable to account for the same as administrator when it does not appear that he has ever made any transfer of such fund to himself as trustee.[82] An executor who was also an agent or trustee of the testator in his lifetime cannot, after the final settlement of his accounts as executor, be called on to account in equity as such trustee;[83] there can be no separate accounting in the two different capacities.[84] A statement in an executor's inventory that the estate had a residuary interest in certain land whose legal title was in him cannot affect such executor's right to apply for an accounting to the circuit court of the trust, which existed independent of his position as executor.[85]

[§ 2320] 8. One of the daughters died, and the survivor, believing that she was entitled to the whole estate, settled with the guardian, and accepted as cash claims against third persons, and executed a release in full, and later she was appointed administratrix of the deceased daughter. For nine years an adult heir of testatrix acquiesced in the construction of the will; but the court finally determined that the title of the deceased daughter was absolute at her death, and that her share in the property did not pass exclusively to the surviving daughter. An infant administrator is responsible for all acts done after he becomes of age and before revocation of his appointment.[98] A court of equity regards him as a trustee and compels him so far to account, but not with respect to assets which came into his hands during infancy.[99]

"It was the administration of a small estate which was devised in 1765, and yet no account is settled by the executors till after all their deaths in 1786, when a partial one is made up by the executors of the survivor. This had a bad aspect respecting the executors; but since no fraud or misconduct is imputed to them in the management of the estate, nor any apparent advantage, which they could or did derive to themselves from the omission, but on the contrary a probable disadvantage, in having articles disallowed for defect in the proof, which they might have justified at an earlier period, we inclined to attribute it to inattention in them, and confidence on the part of the legatees in their integrity, rather than to any impure motives, and, therefore, think it would be too severe to deny them justice on account of that omission of a duty; for, such perhaps it is, although the law only directs them to render accounts when desired." [a] Accounting dispensed with by agreement of parties.—The filing of an account by an executor or administrator is a matter with which the public has no concern, and with which the parties for whose benefit it is required by law may dispense, whether they are creditors or mere legatees or distributees. This may be done by express agreement, or by implication from long continued acquiescence after the right to demand the account has fully accrued, where the parties entitled to it are of full age and under no legal disability, especially if in the meantime the one who subsequently asks for it has acted in a way calculated to mislead the person sought to be charged. Harlan's Est., 3 Pa. Dist. 809, 16 Pa. Co. 51, 1 LackLegN 122.

[b] Agreement as to part of assets.—The fact that testator's widow and children agreed to a distribution among them of mining stocks belonging to the estate, if it was in effect an agreement to set aside the terms of the will, should not be extended beyond the property immediately affected thereby, and would have no

his obligation to account by the terms of the will,[11] he is not so relieved merely because the will gives him absolute discretion as to the management of the estate,[12] or allows him a specified time in which to settle the same;[13] nor does a gift to the personal representative of the entire estate for life, or in the case of a widow who is made executrix for life or during widowhood, relieve from the duty to account,[14] unless the will itself evidences a testamentary intent that an accounting shall not be required,[15] and the same has been held true of a gift to the executor of the whole estate with absolute power to manage or sell it.[16] Permission from the court to an administrator to retain in his possession the money of minors does not relieve him from the obligation to make annual and final settlements,[17] nor is the representative relieved from the duty to account by the mere fact that proceedings in bankruptcy had been instituted against decedent, and an assignee chosen, where it appears that the assignee did not accept the trust, that no assignment in bankruptcy was ever made, and that the proceedings had been practically abandoned.[18] Where, after a will has been duly probated, the executrix, both by assignment and under the will, acquired the right to have the entire residence distributed to her absolutely, and after the time for filing claims had expired she filed a petition for distribution containing a detailed description of all the property of the estate, and alleging that she had filed no accounts, as executrix, because she was entitled to have the whole of the residue distributed to her, such statement constituted a waiver of an account, and it was therefore proper for the court, after due notice, to direct distribution without requiring the executrix to file an account.[19]

[§ 2322] b. Lack of Assets. Where no assets have come into the possession of an executor or administrator, no accounting should be required of him,[20] but where the personal representative has received assets he cannot escape liability to account by showing that all of such assets have been paid out.[21]

[§ 2323] c. Bond to Pay Debts and Legacies. Where an executor who is also the residuary legatee has given bond to pay the testator's debts and legacies, as he may do in some jurisdictions,[22] a bill in equity cannot be maintained against him for an accounting,[23] nor can a probate accounting be com-bearing upon a daughter's right to demand an accounting of the profits of the business, or as to other assets of the estate. Matter of Hiscox, 135 App. Div. 848, 120 NYS 308.

[c] Acquiescence in acts of executor or administrator.—If the beneficiaries of the estate concur in the misapplication of the assets by the executor or administrator, or if they acquiesce therein without original concurrence, they cannot afterward compel him to account for such assets. [a] Will relieving from liability to account in orphans' court.—"The will directs, that the residue of the testator's property should be kept together, under the control and management of Mrs. Sellers, 'to be managed entirely at her discretion,' for the use and benefit of the testator's family, for the support of his wife, and for the support and education of his children. The will also expresses the testator's desire, that Mrs. S. should not be held to account, or to settle with the orphans' court, for the management and possession of his estate. So far as the conduct of Mrs. S. had reference to the support of the family, and the support and education of the children, she acted under a discretionary power, and would not be responsible, unless her conduct was fraudulent, which is negatived by the allegations of the bill. We think, too, that so far as the mere 'management and possession of the estate' were concerned, the will exempts her from accounting, and also from the duty of settling in the court designated. Viewing the sentence as to the liability to account in connection with the discretionary power bestowed upon her, and looking to the grammatical construction of the sentence, we understand it to relieve her altogether from liability to account for the 'management and possession of the estate.' The word estate is used in various senses. It is often used to designate the property composing the assets of a decedent; or the property, real and personal, belonging to an existing individual. In that sense, we think the word is used in the will. In the same connection, there is an exemption from liability to account for the possession of the estate. The thing intended to be designated, was something tangible—susceptible of possession, as well as management. The clause must, therefore, be understood to relieve her from liability to account for the management and possession of the property belonging to the estate, and coming under the operation of the will. She is also relieved from settling in the orphans' court; but the words relieving her from that duty, do not have a sufficiently extensive import to justify us in holding her exempted from responsibility in any forum." [b] A surety on the bond to pay debts and legacies given by an executor who is residuary legatee cannot maintain a bill in equity against the executor and the other sureties on the bond for an accounting, the ap-

[§ 2325] 10. Consequences of Failure to Account.[29] Failure of an executor or administrator to account is an omission of duty and a breach of trust.[30] Under various statutes a representative who fails to account as required may become personally liable for the debts of the estate[31] may have an execution awarded against him for the full value of whatever personal property decedent has come to his hands,[32] may incur a penalty,[33] or may subject himself to liability to imprisonment[34] or to indictment.[35] Failure to account may also raise a presumption of misappropriation of assets that have come to the hands of the representative,[36] or require that all doubts be resolved against him,[37] and a representative who fails to keep and render accounts will be held to strict proof that he has done his duty.[38] It has been held, however, that in a suit by the distributees against an executrix to restrain the enforcement of a deed executed by plaintiff's father to the executrix to secure an overpayment of the father's distributive share, an allegation that the executrix had properly expended the entire personal estate warranted the court in adopting defendant's statement of the account, although she had failed to present a complete account of her administration.[39]

Statement of account by interested persons. It has been held that, where an executor or administrator refuses to file an account, it is proper for those interested to state an account for him.[40]

[§ 2326] C. Proceedings for Accounting—1. In General. A personal representative's account can be settled only in some proceeding appropriate for that purpose, in a court having the requisite jurisdiction.[41] Proceedings by attachment are inapplicable for the purpose of compelling the settlement of an estate,[42] nor can a proceeding provided in case of failure to file an inventory be invoked to compel an account by a personal representative.[43] Where plaintiff sued to establish a lost deed, and to enforce an alleged resulting trust of realty, she could not in that action compel an accounting of personal property belonging to an estate in which she claimed an interest, it not appearing that the administrator was a party to the action in his representative capacity.[44] But where, in a suit by a life tenant to recover his life estate, it appeared that defendant, as executor of the ancestor, had refrained from filing an inventory of the estate under the will, or to render any accounts, it was held he might properly be required in such proceedings to account for any personal property that passed under the will in order that the life tenant's rights in the personal property might be ascertained.[45]

The fact that an executor could be held by the court as in contempt for failure to turn over assets to a receiver will not prevent the court from ordering him to account for the assets of the estate in his possession.[46]

[§ 2327] 2. Nature of Proceeding. It has been held that a proceeding in a court of probate jurisdiction to compel an accounting by an executor or administrator is a proceeding in rem,[47] but, on the other hand, it has been said that a proceeding by an administrator for final settlement of his accounts is in personam.[48] A petition in a suit in equity by distributees against the administrator for an accounting and settlement, alleging fraudulent conpointment of a receiver, and an administration of the estate by the court of chancery. McElroy v. Hatheway, 44 Mich. 399, 6 NW 8567.

cealment of assets, refusal to account, and appropriation of moneys to personal use, is not demurrable on the ground that petitioner has an adequate remedy at law.[49]

[§ 2328] 3. Jurisdiction—a. In General. An executor or administrator cannot be compelled to account by an action in a court of common law,[50] but only by a proceeding in a court of probate,[51] or of equity.[52]

A common-law action of account will not, it is usually held, lie against an executor or administrator,[53] although the contrary view has been asserted,[54] and provision is sometimes made by statute for such an action between coexecutors and coadministrators.[55]

Insolvency courts have no jurisdiction to compel the executors or administrators of deceased trustees to account in these courts for the trust estate.[56]

[§ 2329] b. Probate Courts—(1) In General. Jurisdiction as to accounting and settlement by personal representatives is usually given to probate courts, or to general courts upon which probate power is expressly conferred,[57] although courts of equity in many instances also have jurisdiction as to these matters.[58] The extent of the jurisdiction of probate courts as to such matters depends upon the constitutional and statutory provisions conferring it, and it must be exercised in accordance with such provisions.[59] of administration is generally the proper court to exercise jurisdiction in the settling of the account of the executor or administrator,[60] but it has been held that, where the personal representative has died without having rendered an account, the account can be rendered only in the probate court where his own estate is administered,[61] although the statutes sometimes give to the probate court which issued letters jurisdiction to entertain a petition by a surviving executor against the executor of his deceased coexecutor to compel the filing of an inventory and the rendition of an account.[62]

Effect of agreement of parties interested. Under a statute providing that a division of the estate of an intestate by agreement of the parties interested, executed and filed in the probate court, shall operate as a valid distribution of such estate, the execution and filing of an agreement by all the heirs, wherein they agreed what each of them should have and take as his or her share of the estate, does not deprive the probate court of jurisdiction over the administrator's accounts, where at the time of the filing of the agreement there had been no settlement thereof, and there remained in the representative's hands a considerable part of the estate.[63]

Waiver of jurisdictional question. When a coexecutor filed in the orphans' court a petition to compel the representatives of his deceased coexecutor to file an inventory and render an accounting, and to pay over to petitioner any sum remaining in the hands of the deceased coexecutor, any question of jurisdiction was waived by act of the representatives of the deceased executor in filing the inventory,[64] and it was too late to make the question after petitioner had excepted to the inventory as filed.[65]

[§ 2330] (2) Matters Incidental to Accounting and Settlement. As a general rule probate courts have jurisdiction to do everything necessary to the full and final administrations of estates,[66] and should so exercise their powers as to settle all questions in controversy if this is practicable.[67] Accordingly under the statutes of the several states such courts have jurisdiction as to various matters incidental to accounting and settlement.[68] to the proceeding for an accounting where a construction becomes necessary to the determination of questions arising on the accounting,[69] but the will cannot be construed in a proceeding to compel an accounting by an executor of an executor, where it appears that no accounting should be had.[70] Upon an accounting by the executor of the original testator, the validity of trusts created by the devisee's exercise of a power of appointment which are to commence in futuro, should not be determined.[71]

Title to property. Ordinarily a probate court has no jurisdiction to decide a dispute as to the ownership of personal property,[72] or to try the title to real estate,[73] but this question should if necessary be determined by some other tribunal before an accounting is ordered.[74] In some jurisdictions, however, where a question of title arises between the personal representative and the estate such question may be determined by the court of probate jurisdiction upon the accounting,[75] although this even has been denied.[76] The question whether decedent held property in trust, and the administrator, therefore, took a transfer thereof subject to the same trust, cannot be determined on exceptions to the administrator's final account,[77] but only in a personal action against him to enforce the trust.[78]

[§ 2331] (3) Where Trust Created by Will.[79] In Alabama it has been decided that when a trust is created by will the probate courts have no jurisdiction to enforce or settle such trust;[80] but this principle does not oust the jurisdiction of the probate court in all cases where a testator by his will devolves testamentary trusts upon the person appointed executor, and in such cases the probate court may properly undertake to settle up such matters as pertain to the executorial duties or office, and decline to take cognizance of the extraordinary trusts which fall outside of the scope or sphere of the ordinary duties of executors and administrators.[81] In New Jersey it has been said that it would seem difficult to create a pure trust by will which could not be administered in the orphans' court.[82] In Pennsylvania, where the trust is not annexed to the office of executor by the terms of the will, the court of common pleas and the orphans' court have concurrent jurisdiction.[83]

[§ 2332] (4) Accounting after Removal, Resignation, or Death. It seems that probate courts generally have jurisdiction to compel personal representatives to account even after they have been removed[84] or have resigned.[85] In Texas it has been held not to be within the jurisdiction of a county court, sitting in probate, to determine the amount due from a deceased personal representative,[86] but in New York the surrogate's court has power, in a proceeding to settle an executor's accounts, to determine a claim against the estate of another which was administered by the executor's testatrix.[87]

[§ 2333] (5) Accounting after Final Settlement. After the final account of a personal representative has been rendered and allowed, the jurisdiction of the probate court to compel an accounting terminates.[88] But where an heir asked for an accounting by the administrator of his father's estate during the first year after attaining his majority, and within eight years after the administrator claimed to have made distribution of the estate, it was held that the estate had not been closed in a legal manner, and the probate court had jurisdiction of the proceeding for such accounting.[89] Where an administrator, who was also general guardian for the infants next of kin, was a codefendant with his wards in an action in the supreme court for the partition of real estate, and in that action a decree was rendered directing payment to him of large sums out of his wards' shares of the proceeds of sale, this was not such a settlement of his accounts as precluded the surrogate from investigating and accepting them.[90]

[§ 2334] (6) Enforcement of Orders or Judgments. After the death of an executor or administrator the probate court has no jurisdiction to enforce against his personal representative a decree rendered in final settlement against the representative.[91] It has been held that the jurisdiction of the ordinary extends no further than to take and adjust accounts, and he has no authority to enforce the performance of his order or decree.[92]

[§ 2335] c. Territorial Jurisdiction. A personal representative should as a general rule be compelled to account in the tribunals of the county in which administration was granted.[93] In a bill by heirs for an injunction against the sale of lands and for an accounting, a prayer that the administrator be compelled to deliver the lands to the heirs does not render the suit one respecting title to the lands so as to require a decree from the court in whose jurisdiction the lands lie.[94] The jurisdiction of a surrogate is not limited to the bounds of his county, but he may send a citation to any part of the state to compel a personal representative to account and settle.[95] Where a will has been proved in a foreign state, the executors can be called to account there for their dealings with the estate,[96] but it is otherwise where the will has not been probated in the foreign state.[97] A personal representative who changes his domicile is still bound to account to the court of his former domicile where the administration was granted,[98] and where letters testamentary upon the estate of a resident of one state are granted in that state to a resident of another state, the estate must be settled in the former state and the courts of the latter state have no jurisdiction over the accounts of the personal representative.[99] After submitting his account to the examination of an auditor appointed by a probate court to audit his administration account, and after a decision by the auditor, it is too late for an executor to object that money accounted for was received for land in another state, and was therefore not within the jurisdiction of the court to which he has submitted his account.[1] A bill in chancery seeking to revive a proceeding against an estate long after its final settlement is properly dismissed where it appears that the parties thereto are nonresidents and no property of the estate remains in the state;[2] in this condition of things the courts of their own state should be resorted to for relief.[3]

Transfer of proceedings. Ordinarily proceedings to settle estates cannot be transferred from one county to another,[4] but when the county in which decedent resided and in which administration on his estate was granted is divided and a new county formed, in which his estate is situated, jurisdiction of the settlement of such estate may be transferred to the new county.[5]

[§ 2336] 4. Limitations and Laches—a. Statutes of Limitations. The general rule is that the relation of a personal representative and persons entitled to the estate is that of trustee and cestuis que trust, and so long as this relation is acknowledged to exist between the parties and the trust is continued, the general statute of limitations does not constitute a bar to a proceeding to compel an accounting and settlement.[6] But when this relation ceases to exist or where the personal representative does some act by which he renounces his trust character and such cestuis que trust have full notice so as to put them on their remedies, and there is no disability or other impediment in the way of their enforcing their rights, the statute of limitations is set in operation.[7] Mere neglect to render accounts at the time required by law will not, however, start the running of the statute of limitations,[8] nor is a settlement of an estate or what purports to be a final account necessarily a termination of the trust which will set the statute in operation.[9]

A statute limiting the time within which creditors must make their claims does not bar the right of a legatee to have an accounting after the time therein limited.[10]

In New York the rule as stated by most of the decisions is that proceedings in a surrogate's court to compel an accounting and settlement by a personal representative are barred by the statute of limitations applicable to special proceedings if not commenced within the statutory period from the time when the right to compel such accounting or settlement accrued.[11] There are, however, cases in

"While the duties pertaining to the office of a guardian of property and that of an executor or administrator may not be materially different respecting matters of accounting and liability to account, and it may, with much plausibility of argument, be contended that the rule of limitation applicable to one is alike applicable to the other, and that such rule should be the one applied in equity to trustees, seemingly laid down in In re Camp, 126 N. Y. 377, 27 NE 799, yet we are of the opinion that the court in that case did not intend to alter, modify or change the rule of limitation made applicable to proceedings to compel payment of a distributive share or an accounting by an executor or administrator, established by the long and almost uniform line of decisions which we have cited. There is nothing in the language of the opinion which imports any such purpose, and no such intention should be presumed. This view of the case is strengthened by the fact that in the case of Butler v. Johnson, 111 N. Y. 204, 18 NE 643, the Court of Appeals (in an opinion also written by Peckham, J.) recognized and reiterated the rule that the six years' Statute of Limitations would bar a proceeding in Surrogate's Court against an executrix to compel the payment of a legacy; and it seems to us that we would not be warranted in presuming that the court intended to overrule the doctrine there recognized, without even referring to it . . . It has several times been urged in our appellate courts that the provisions incorporated into the statute by the adoption of section 1819 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which provides that 'for the purpose of computing the time within which such an action must be commenced, the cause of action is deemed to accrue when the executor's or administrator's account is judicially settled and not before,' has changed the rule of limitation governing special proceedings in Surrogate's Court of this nature. The opinions expressed by our judges upon the question have not been entirely harmonious. The section referred to relates exclusively to actions, and makes no reference to special proceedings instituted for the purposes mentioned. It will be observed, also, that this section does not change or alter the period of limitation, but only prescribes the time from whence it is to be computed. The weight of authority seems to be to the effect that the rule of limitation applied by that section to an action does not affect the rule of limitation applied to a special proceeding in Surrogate's Court, and that the six years' statute is still a bar to such proceedings." Matter of Miller, 15 Misc. 556, 561, 37 NYS 1129, 26 NYCivProc 13.

[a] The reason for rule is that the legislature never could have intended to give to a party the right to institute such a suit before a surrogate, after his remedy was barred by the statute of limitations in all other courts. McCartee v. Camel, 1 Barb. Ch. (N. Y.) 455.

[b] Infant legatees and heirs at law.—As to persons under age when the cause of action accrues, the time of such disability is not a part of the time limited. Matter of Fond, 40 Misc. 66, 81 NYS 249; Collins' Est., 6 NYCivProc 85, 3 Dem. Surr. 30.

[c] A proceeding by an administrator de bonis non to compel the representative of his deceased predecessor to account is controlled by the ten years' statute applicable to suits in equity. [d] Liability of personal representative of deceased executor.—Where an executor dies before the statute has run against his liability to account, it will not run against the liability of his personal representative to settle the account, until the expiration of the statutory period after the latter's appointment. Matter of Irvin, 68 App. Div. 158, 74 NYS 443.

[e] When statute not a defense.—(1) The six-year statute of limitations forms no defense to an action for an accounting of the administration of testatrix's estate by the life beneficiary, to whom letters cum testamento annexo were issued and the estate surrendered five years before the proceedings were instituted, although eleven years have elapsed since the issuance of letters to the executors. In re Post, 9 NYS 449, 2 Conn. Surr. 243 [dist In re Van Dyke, 44 Hun (N. Y.) 394]. (2) Where an executor pays over assets to legatees in advance of the final settlement of the estate, and thereafter a judgment for costs is recovered against the estate in an action brought by him, the statute of limitations is no defense to proceedings to compel an accounting by him, brought by the judgment creditor. "It stands undisputed that the respondent Meyer qualified and entered upon the duties of his office as executor and received and took possession of the property of the testator. By virtue of the relation thus created the executor became trustee of those persons entitled to take pursuant to the provisions of the will. Occupying such relation, the Statute of Limitations would not begin to run until by some act sufficient for the purpose he repudiated his liability as trustee." Matter of Meyer, 98 App. Div. 7, 8, 90 NYS 185.

"In In re Camp, 126 N. Y. 377, 27 NE 799, the Court of Appeals decided that a general guardian could be compelled to render an account sixteen years after his ward became of age, because the fund received by him as guardian was the property of another confided to his care, and in that sense he occupied the position of a trustee so as to prevent the running of the Statute of Limitations, even if it was not a trust in the usual legal sense of the term. There are some distinctions between the nature and duties of the office of an executor and an administrator and those of a general guardian, but I doubt if they be of such a character as to place them outside of the application of the decision in In re Camp, 126 N. Y. 377, 27 NE 799, when so broad a character, as to their duties to account, is given such officers. Executors and administrators are appointed to take the custody and care of the property of others impressed with certain duties and trusts which they must discharge in order to be relieved either by their actual performance, or by the presumption of their having been performed; and it would seem that this presumption will not arise until such duties have been openly repudiated for the statutory period, and does not by the expiration of the statutory period after the time fixed for them to account." [a], Accordingly (1) where the estate cannot be settled until the happening of certain contingencies the statute does not begin to run before that time has arrived. In re Hodgman, 10 NYS 491. (2) So also where a legatee is entitled to a life interest in the estate the statute does not begin to run during the life of the beneficiary. Matter of Jones, 51 App. Div. 420, 64 NYS 667; Matter enforcing an obligation or liability to the estate[16] or paying a person having a claim against the estate[17] will not prevent the running of the statute, where it does not appear that the person seeking an account has been under any disability or that he has acted in ignorance of or been misled with respect to his rights in the premises, or that he has remained in repose or been inactive by reason of any promise, statement, or representation made by the personal representative.[18] Where, however, the representative has by his acts held out to those beneficially interested in the estate that he was engaged in winding up the estate and discharging the claims prior to theirs, the statute does not run as against such persons,[19] and part payment of a legacy will interrupt the running of the statute of limitations as against the right of the legatee to require an accounting.[20] It has been held that a personal representative may interpose the defense of the statute of limitations at any time before the close of the evidence, and need not interpose it in a formal manner,[21] but a motion to dismiss the citation to account has been held not the proper mode of raising the objection that the right to demand an account is barred by the statute.[22] It has been held that the question whether the statute is a bar should be decided before the accounting is had,[23] but the contrary rule has also been asserted.[24] A personal representative who sets up a defense of the statute of limitations in his answer to a proceeding does not waive this defense by voluntarily filing an account.[25] Where, however, executors or administrators, many years after their appointment, petition for a voluntary account, and those interested are cited to appear, such executors cannot set up the statute of limitations.[26]

Statutes expressly made applicable to proceedings for accounting are found in some jurisdictions.[27]

[§ 2337] b. Presumption from Lapse of Time. It is a well settled general rule that a presumption that a personal representative has duly accounted and settled may arise from lapse of time,[28] although a contrary rule is sometimes established by express statutory provision.[29] Such presumption is not a flat bar to a proceeding for an accounting, but it can be overcome either by the acts or admissions of the personal representative or by other competent evidence, its practical effect being merely to shift the burden of proof,[30] unless, according to the view obtaining in some states, twenty years have elapsed, in which event no accounting can be compelled unless there have been admissions of the personal representative or recognition by him of the trust as continuing and unsettled,[31] or unless there has been some disability of the persons entitled to an account.[32]

of McCormick, 27 Misc. 416, 59 NYS 374; Matter of Campbell, 21 Misc. 133, 47 NYS 29. (3) The same rule applies where the personal representative is entitled to a life interest in the estate. Peltz v. Schultes, 64 Hun 369, 19 NYS 637.

[b] The right of a legatee who has obtained a judgment for his legacy to commence a proceeding for leave to issue execution against a personal representative does not accrue until after the entry of the judgment; and hence the issuing of an order by a surrogate requiring the personal representative to render an immediate account showing the assets in his hands is not prevented by the mere fact that the statute has run against any application for an accounting for the purpose of compelling the personal representative to pay the legacy. effect of the lapse of time in this respect, however, may be obviated either by the facts of the case or by evidence showing a subsisting right in the petitioner and a corresponding obligation on the part of the executor or administrator.[34] Thus, it has been held that lapse of time does not bar an accounting if it appears that there are assets in the hands of the executor or administrator,[35] or if no account has ever been filed;[36] nor is the doctrine of laches applicable to a person under disability.[37] Neither is the doctrine of laches applicable where the representative has acquiesced in the delay by refusing to render his accounts and by resisting a suit brought against him for an accounting,[38] or where he has kept the estate in his hands for many years under the pretense of outstanding debts.[39]

Laches of representative. In a case where an executor failed to account for over twenty years, and the estate had been so managed that it would be impossible to arrive at the correct balance between the executor and the beneficiaries, the court refused to decree an account on the application of the executor, who claimed disbursements largely in excess of receipts.[40]

[§ 2340] 6. Stay of Proceedings. A surrogate has power to stay accounting proceedings in a proper case.[42]

"The Court cannot interfere in this matter. The testator died in 1815, and now, after an interval of seventeen years, an inventory and account have been called for, and I am of opinion the demand has been sufficiently complied with, for although this lapse of time is not an absolute bar to a disclosure of the deceased's assets, yet after a delay of so many years a full and particular inventory and account cannot be expected or required, and therefore a declaration has been substituted and produced." Higgins v. Higgins, 4 Hagg. Eccl. 242, 162 Reprint 1435.

"If the party in interest has been contented to let the estate rest for more than a quarter of a century, it is not very unreasonable to suppose that she has been satisfied with what she supposed to be the course of administration. The whole policy of the law is against the enforcement of stale demands, when, from the mere fact of acquiescence, the party responsible for the discharge of a trust may have been led into a less careful preservation of vouchers and accounts, than would otherwise have been the case, had the duty of accounting been insisted upon at an earlier period." [c] Acknowledgment within prescriptive period.—The lapse of twenty years does not release an executor or administrator from liability to account if there has been a recognition by him within that time of his obligation. Werborn v. Austin, 82 Ala. 498, 8 S 280.

Matter of Sherwood, 105 Misc. 183, 173 NYS 639. (2) The pendency of an appeal from a judgment in favor of the administrator in an action against him as such does not preclude approval of his final account and final closing of the estate, the claim against the estate having been disposed of in the trial court, and claimant, in case of his success on the appeal, having a remedy under the statute providing for reopening estates after final settlement in a proper case. count to the register or clerk, who duly issues a citation directing next of kin, creditors, legatees, and all other persons interested in the estate to appear before the probate court at a day stated and show cause, if any they have, against its allowance, and such proceedings are frequently regulated by express statute.[43] A personal representative will not, however, be permitted to settle an account in the probate court merely for his own benefit or convenience.[44] It has been held that after the representative has cited persons interested and they have appeared and filed objections they cannot cite the representative to appear for settlement in compulsory proceedings;[45] but it has also been considered that a voluntary proceeding and an involuntary proceeding for an accounting of the same estate may be consolidated when such consolidation is shown to be equitable.[46]

Nature of proceeding. A voluntary accounting by an executor or administrator is in the nature of a proceeding in rem.[47]

By temporary administrator. Where a temporary administrator was appointed pending a contest of the will and the will was admitted to probate and letters testamentary issued to the executor named therein, and subsequently an appeal was taken from the decree of probate, and the temporary administrator, after the appeal was taken, filed an account and prayed for a settlement thereof, it was held that the accounting should be deferred until an order of court authorizing the executor to exercise full powers was obtained or until the appeal was determined.[48]

[§ 2342] b. Parties. On a voluntary accounting and settlement by an executor or administrator it is necessary to join as parties all persons interested,[49] including legatees,[50] distributees,[51] heirs,[52] and creditors, where they have an interest in the accounting,[53] as for instance where the estate is insolvent so that their claims are not paid in full.[54] It is also proper to join sureties on the administration bond,[55] and one who has a vested remainder interest in the estate,[56] as well as persons interested in the estate of a deceased coexecutor of the accountant;[57] and it has been held that the probate court has jurisdiction to bring in a trust company, named as depositary of the funds in the hands of a temporary administrator, as a party to a judicial accounting of such administrator.[58] Where the settlement is not a final one, but the representative has resigned, the administrator de bonis non is a proper party.[59] It has been held that a mere debtor of the estate or the trustee of a voidable trust attempted to be created by the decedent is not a necessary or proper party,[60] but it has also been held that in an action by the administrator of a decedent and the present guardian of an infant of whom decedent was guardian at the time of his death, brought against his heirs at law, creditors, and the surety on his bond as guardian, for a settlement of the estate and his accounts as such guardian and to recover for the present guardian the amount due the ward, certain claimants and holders of parts of the trust fund belonging to the estate of such ward, which they had wrongfully received from the decedent as guardian and aided him in misappropriating, were necessary parties to the action and were properly made so by an amended petition, and the cross petition of the surety in the bond which had been given by the decedent as guardian.[61] Persons interested in the estate are sometimes given by statute the right to appear on the hearing, although they have not been cited,[62] and this right extends to next of kin whose interest is contingent.[63] It is not necessary to cite or join as parties illegitimate relatives of decedent,[64] or persons holding disputed assignments of interests in the estate,[65] nor need the attorney-general be included in the citation in proceedings for the settlement of the account of a public administrator with respect to an estate in his charge.[66] Where an intestate made an assignment to his wife in writing of all interests in the estate of a brother, a receiver of property of such assignor on behalf of his creditors had no standing, in a proceeding in the surrogate's court on accounting by the administrator of the estate of the assignor's brother, to object to such assignment, the court being without jurisdiction in the matter.[67] On an accounting by an administrator appointed pending probate of the will the executor represents beneficiaries, and, in the absence of fraud or collusion, is the only person whom it is necessary to cite.[68]

[§ 2343] c. Citation or Notice—(1) In General. Generally, before rendering his account and making a settlement of the estate, a personal representative must cause a citation to issue or give due notice to all persons interested, stating the time and place of such accounting and settlement and such other matters as are required by statute.[69] Sometimes, under statute, notice of an intended settlement of a representative's account must be given whether the settlement is annual or partial or final,[70] but it has been held that a notice of final settlement need not be given where an executor or administrator intends to resign or has resigned.[71]

The settlement must be pursuant to the notice given,[72] and hence notice of an annual or partial settlement will not support a decree of final settlement.[73]

Revival of accounting. Where an executor died during the pendency of an accounting and the proceedings were dropped, and other proceedings were instituted by the administrator with the will annexed to compel an accounting by the personal representatives of the deceased executor, but during the pendency of these proceedings the personal representatives of the deceased executor obtained an ex parte order reviving the old accounting by the executor and requiring the issuance of a citation to all interested to attend such settlement, it was held that such order was not authorized except on notice to all interested of the application therefor and that an appearance of all those interested, in response to the citation, was not sufficient to authorize another order reviving the old accounting, since they were entitled to notice of such an order before its issuance.[74]

A special administrator, appointed pending the contested probate of a will, may settle and be discharged without giving previous notice of the contemplated settlement.[75]

The personal representative cannot object to the notice for want of regularity, as such notice is intended for the benefit of creditors and distributees and not for his advantage.[76]

[§ 2344] (2) Mode of Giving Notice. Publication or posting is the more usual mode of giving notice of the accounting of an executor or administrator,[77] although personal service is sometimes required.[78] In Louisiana it is held that notification of the filing of a tableau operates as a citation to all persons concerned therein, creditors as well as legatees, and the homologation of an account and tableau bars all further inquiries as to all matters included in the account.[79]

[§ 2345] (3) Proof of Service or Publication. It is usually considered that service or publication of notice of the hearing with respect to the final account of an executor or administrator must be shown affirmatively,[80] and a recital in a decree that proof of service of citation was produced is not conclusive.[81] But there is also authority for the view that it will be presumed, until the contrary is shown, that notice has been given according to the statute,[82] and it is sometimes provided by statute that the finding in the order shall be conclusive evidence of the fact whether or not proof of notice was made.[83] An indorsement by a clerk of a probate court on the petition of an administrator that notice was published on a certain day is not sufficient proof of the publication of the notice required by law.[84]

[§ 2346] (4) Effect of Lack of Notice. It is generally held that where proper notice of an account has not been given the accounting is void,[85] unless there have been actual appearances [86] or notice has been otherwise waived.[87] But it has also been held that the requirement of notice is directory only,[88] and that it is merely an irregularity for the probate court to confirm an account before notice of the filing thereof has been given.[89] It has also been held to be immaterial whether minor heirs were properly served with notice of an executor's final report and his discharge, where the order was favorable to the minors, in that a release of a portion of the widow's award was thereby approved.[90]

[§ 2348] d. Appearance. The voluntary appearance of persons interested in the estate in accounting proceedings amounts to a waiver of any defects with respect to notice.[93] The effect of a failure of persons properly cited to appear is to enable the representative to proceed ex parte as to them.[94]

[§ 2349] e. Pleadings. The pleadings in a voluntary settlement by the representative are the account filed by him and the objections, if any, thereto.[95]

[§ 2350] f. Evidence. Where testator bequeathed all of his personal property to his widow for life or widowhood, one of the executors on voluntary proceedings for a final accounting was entitled to testify that the perishable property was sold as the property of the widow, and that the proceeds belonged to her.[96]

[§ 2351] g. Judgment and Relief Awarded. When an executor or administrator files an account and asks for its approval the judgment so secured is binding upon him,[97] and he cannot object to it upon the ground that it was rendered ex parte.[98] In an action by an executor to settle his accounts the executrix of the estate of testator's son cannot compel the adjustment of the son's interest in an estate of which the father was executor at the time of his death.[99]

[§ 2352] h. Proceedings in Equity. It has been held that when an executor or administrator finds the affairs of his testator or intestate so much involved that he cannot safely administer the estate except under the direction of a court of equity, he may institute a suit in equity against creditors for the purpose of having all their claims adjusted and a final decree ordering the payment of the assets.[1]

[§ 2353] 8. Compulsory Accounting — a. By Probate Proceedings—(1) In General. A personal representative who does not render his account will ordinarily be compelled to do so by a citation from the probate court,[2] which may exercise its power to require an accounting ex mero motu whenever the exigencies of the case seem to require it.[3] A second proceeding for an accounting cannot be instituted while the first is pending.[4]

Consolidation of proceedings. Where three separate petitions were filed, requiring different surviving executors and executors of deceased executors to file accounts, and that all persons interested should be cited to attend a final settlement of the estate, an order requiring an executor to account will not be reversed because the surrogate heard all the proceedings together, when no evil result is shown, and where the rights of all persons were protected.[5]

[§ 2354] (2) Parties. Who are entitled to an administration account, and from whom such an account may be required, are questions which have already been discussed,[6] and this discussion necessarily enumerates most of the persons who may become parties to a probate proceeding for an account. The only general rule that can be stated is that those persons who have an interest in the accounting in a particular case are the proper parties thereto.[7] Where the next of kin, entitled to a share of the estate, calls the administrator to an account, and claims to be entitled to the share of either of the other next of kin, such persons should be made parties to the proceedings.[8] A depositary designated by the court is a proper party,[9] and a receiver in supplementary proceedings is a proper party to the accounting of the debtor as administrator of his deceased wife.[10] Where infants without a general guardian are interested, a guardian ad litem should be appointed for them and made a party.[11]

Intervention may be allowed for the protection of an ultimate interest, although the applicant is not a necessary party;[12] but where proceedings have been instituted by one having no right to institute them, and an answer denying the right of the petitioner to require an accounting has been filed, a party in interest should not be allowed to inter-

[§ 2355] (3) Petition. One who seeks to compel an accounting and settlement by an executor or administrator should ordinarily present a petition showing his right to such relief,[14] although sometimes, under statute, a citation is all the pleading that is necessary.[15] The petition need not conform strictly to the rules of pleading,[16] but the relief sought should be stated,[17] and the facts relied on for relief should be distinctly averred so that the court may be informed and the personal representative receive notice of all he is required to answer.[18] The petitioner should sufficiently show or aver his interest or right to an accounting,[19] and if the allegation of the interest is positive, that is, if facts sufficient in the first instance, if uncontroverted to show a legal interest are stated on oath, an account will be ordered,[20] notwithstanding the fact that the interest of the party applying is denied.[21] A petition to compel the filing of a final account must aver that decedent's estate is ready for the final settlement.[22] Where a petition for a decree for a distribution of income received and to be received by executors prays for general relief, the probate court can order an accounting, although the answer of the executors shows that the petition could not be sustained as a petition for distribution.[23] Matters in avoidance of the statute of limitations need not be stated.[24]

Verification. It has been held that the petition should be verified,[25] but there is also authority for the view that verification is not essential,[26] and verification by the attorney of the applicant has been held sufficient, although made on information and belief without giving any reason why the petition was not verified by the applicant.[27]

[§ 2356] (4) Citation or Notice. The citation or notice to a personal representative, which is generally made necessary in compulsory proceedings for an accounting, should conform to statutory require-

It is insisted that the defendant should have used form No. 121 of the probate blanks. But this is the general form of the citation to settle an account in the probate court and not applicable to the special and extraordinary conditions alleged to exist in this case. The statute establishing uniformity in the use of blanks in the probate court is not to be so construed as to deprive the petitioner of his remedy if there is no prescribed form adapted to the existing situation. ments and should be served in accordance therewith;[28] and it should appear from the record that proper notice was given.[29] An error or irregularity in the notice or citation or in the service thereof may be waived by the representative's general appearance,[30] or by his rendering his account,[31] or submitting to a settlement.[32] Notice to an executor of a petition to a probate court for an accounting is notice that the accounting will cover all his accounts as executor, where the jurisdiction of the probate court extends to requiring him to account for and distribute all that comes into his hands.[33]

An order requiring an executor to file a supplemental account may be made without the institution of a new proceeding by citation when it is made in a pending proceeding for an accounting.[34]

[§ 2357] (5) Answer or Defense. The personal representative may set up as a defense that the petitioner has no interest in the estate,[35] or no valid claim against it,[36] or that there has been a former accounting and settlement.[37] But in order for the plea or answer to be sufficient it should clearly and fully set out the facts relied upon and distinctly aver all matters necessary to negative the duty to account.[38] The representative cannot question the validity of subsequent letters of administration;[39] and in a proceeding to compel an administrator to account for rents to the administrator de bonis non, it is no defense that the heirs were guilty of fraud on such administrator and his sureties in procuring the appointment of a coadministrator, by whom certain of the rents so collected were embezzled.[40] Neither can an executor, who is cited to account on the application of the administrator of a legatee, evade the duty of accounting by setting up payments to himself for bills for medical attendance upon the legatee, and for the legatee's funeral and burial expenses paid by the executor and for board and lodging furnished by the executor.[41] Error cannot be predicated on a refusal to allow the administrator to amend his answer, where all the proof which would have been admissible under an issue made by the proposed amendment could have been received under the case as it already stood.[42]

[§ 2358] (6) Replication. It has been held that, where the answer challenges the position of the petitioner as a party in interest or as a creditor, the petitioner should file a replication and make prima facie proof of the matters contained in the petition.[43]

[§ 2359] (7) Issues. In a proceeding by an heir against his father's administrator for an accounting, an inquiry into the widow's pecuniary condition at the time of trial is irrelevant and improper, especially if it tends to injure the heir by raising the inference that he has been benefited out of property to which the widow was entitled.[44] Where a distributee cites an administrator to a settlement of his accounts before the ordinary, a stranger to the proceeding cannot set up an adverse title to the property sold by the administrator and claim the proceeds from its sale,[45]

[§ 2360] (8) Evidence. Where the duty to file an annual or partial account is imposed by statute, it is not necessary that the interest of one seeking such an account should be proved to the entire satisfaction of the court.[46] An administrator, failing to make returns, has the burden of proving to satisfaction of court and jury that he faithfully discharged his trust.[47]

is denied, it is proper for the probate court to take evidence to satisfy itself that the petitioner is prima facie a person interested in the estate.[49] Where an application for an accounting makes out a plain case of previously undisclosed and undiscovered assets, the surrogate should direct an accounting as to such assets, in the absence of a showing of good cause to the contrary.[50]

[§ 2362] (10) Judgment. In determining upon a petition for an accounting the probate court should not adjudicate as to the interest of the petitioner in the estate, beyond determining that he has prima facie such an interest as to entitle him to an accounting,[51] nor should the court, in making absolute a rule to show cause why a citation to executors to file an account should not issue, direct in the same decree that the executors shall charge themselves with certain amounts.[52] The judgment in a proceeding to compel the administrator of a deceased executor to account for a sum voluntarily concealed by such executor should not determine to whom the fund is payable, but simply that there is a fund and its amount, to be paid over under the decree of the probate court to the proper parties.[53] A legatee is not entitled, in a proceeding against the representative of a deceased executor, to a decree ordering the property of the estate to be delivered to him;[54] the object of the proceeding is only to enable anyone interested to compel the placing of the fund in official custody.[55] In Georgia it is held that in a citation proceeding in the court of ordinary by a distributee against an administrator a personal judgment is intended,[56] but that a judgment de bonis propriis should not be rendered in the absence of any plea by the representative of ne unques executor, a release to himself, plene administravit, or plene administravit præter.[57] A surrogate's finding, on petition to compel an executor to account, that testator's wife survived him, such survival being a matter affecting distribution of the estate, does not bind parties neither cited nor heard.[58] Where an application by creditors to compel an accounting makes out a plain case of previously undisclosed and undiscovered assets, the surrogate should direct an accounting.[59]

[§ 2363] (11) Appeal.[60] Whether an appeal lies from an order of a probate court directing or refusing to direct an executor or administrator to render his account depends upon the nature of the judgment, order, or decree within the statutory provisions of the particular jurisdiction,[61] and is considered elsewhere in this work.[62]

[§ 2364] b. By Action—(1) In General. Persons who are entitled to an accounting by an executor or administrator are not confined to probate proceedings,[63] but may bring an action against the executor and administrator for an accounting in which the claims of all parties may be settled.[64] It has been said, however, that although a court of general jurisdiction possesses concurrent jurisdiction with the surrogate's court to take and state accounts of executors and administrators, it will ordinarily refuse to exercise such jurisdiction and will do so only where special circumstances exist which prevent the surrogate's court from granting full relief, or where, because of such circumstances, justice requires that the accounting be had in the court of general jurisdiction.[65]

[§ 2365] (2) Mode and Form of Procedure. An accounting and settlement may ordinarily be sought by a bill in equity,[66] in which case the bill should be for a general account and settlement of the estate;[67] or a creditor's bill may be brought to reach the assets of a decedent,[68] even though the creditor has not exhausted his remedy at law by judgment and execution,[69] such a case forming an exception to the general rule requiring remedies at law to be exhausted before commencing a creditor's suit.[70] Such a bill may ask that an administrator be compelled to sell decedent's lands and ap-of guaranty entered into by the testator, the executor, and a third person, and determine the extent of the separate liability of the estate and its interest in certain securities. "To determine certain issues of law and fact in advance would in my mind be open to criticism").

ply the proceeds to the payment of debts.[71] Where, in an administration suit, an original bill was filed to procure the distribution of the estate and speedy settlement, a supplemental bill is the appropriate procedure to compel settlement, it having been delayed beyond the time fixed, and to give relief against administrator's attorney, who purchased land belonging to estate.[72]

Allegations of fraud or malversation on the part of an administrator in a suit against his personal representative for an accounting do not change the bill into an action for tort.[73]

[§ 2366] (3) Time for Bringing Action.[74] It has been held that an action for the settlement of an estate may be brought at any time after the granting of letters testamentary or of administration,[75] or as soon as the executor or administrator has qualified.[76] But an executor or administrator is sometimes given, by statute, a certain period of exemption from suit by legatees for a settlement of his accounts, and an action for settlement within that time is premature.[77]

[§ 2367] (4) Parties—(a) In General. The general rule is that all persons entitled to an interest in the estate must be made parties to a suit for a settlement thereof,[78] and conversely an action for an accounting may be brought by any person having such an interest.[79] Where the statute provides that the representatives, and all persons having an interest in the property, and all creditors, must be made parties to an action for the settlement of the estate, a petition which omits any of such persons is defective as to parties.[80] Where a husband and wife by a deed conveyed in trust for their infant daughter certain leasehold personal property, the trustee, not being charged with any active duty relative to the trust, was not a necessary party to a suit for an accounting brought by the daughter at her majority against the executors of the grantors.[81]

A bank in which a decedent held stock is not a necessary party to an action for the settlement of decedent's estate, the bank having no lien upon the interest in the stock.[82]

[§ 2368] (b) Personal Representatives. The executor or administrator is a necessary party to an action for an accounting and settlement,[83] and where there are several personal representatives, all should usually be made parties,[84] although it has been held that an executor or administrator who has never actively administered on the estate is not a necessary party to a bill against his coexecutor or coadministrator for an accounting.[85] In an action against the first administrator or his representative for an accounting, an administrator de bonis non, if such there is, is a necessary party.[86]

[§ 2369] (c) Sureties.[87] The sureties of the representative may, according to some authorities, be made parties to a bill against him for an accounting,[88] and in order that there may be a decree against the sureties as such it is necessary that they should be made parties as sureties, although they are already parties in another capacity.[89] But there is also authority for the view that the sureties on an administration bond cannot properly be joined in proceedings against the administrator for an account and final settlement of the estate,[90] as they are responsible only on the bond and must be sued at law after proper steps have been taken to fix the liability of the administrator.[91]

are not necessary parties,[92] but inasmuch as they may be liable in the event of the insufficiency of the personal assets, they have been held proper parties,[93] and to a creditor's bill asking that the administrator be compelled to sell lands and apply the proceeds to the debts and that the rents and profits received from the lands by the heirs or devisees be applied in the same manner, all the heirs or devisees must be made parties.[94] To a bill by a residuary devisee for an account, an objection that the heir should have been made a party cannot be sustained where it does not appear that the testator left any heir capable of inheriting and where no one had ever claimed the inheritance.[95] The rule that an action cannot be maintained against the heirs and the personal representative jointly does not apply where a creditor has established his demand before the surrogate and the personal estate has been concealed or wasted.[96]

[§ 2371] (e) Legatees and Distributees. To a suit brought by a distributee for a settlement of the estate and recovery of his distributive share, all the other distributees of the estate are generally held necessary parties;[97] and it has been held that, where several legacies are to be increased or diminished as the estate may increase or diminish, one legatee may file a bill on behalf of himself and the others who may choose to come in against the executor for an account and payment, making all other legatees parties,[98] although there is also authority for the view that one legatee cannot bring suit for himself and the other legatees to compel an executor or administrator charged with an express trust to account.[99] Distributees are necessary parties to an action brought by an administrator de bonis non for the settlement of an estate,[1] but are not proper parties to a bill in equity by an administrator to compel his coadministrator to pay over money alleged to be due to the estate.[2] Inasmuch as the executor is the trustee and proper representative of all persons interested in the personal estate and has the duty cast upon him by law of protecting it against improper demands,[3] it is held that legatees are not necessary parties to a bill by creditors for an accounting,[4] although if distributees have received personal property of the estate, the court may make them parties and compel them to account for what they have received.[5] On a bill by a creditor against the executor for an account of assets and the legatees for contribution, if there is a dispute between the executor and legatees as to whether he ought not to pay the debt without contribution from them, and all the legatees are not made parties, the bill may well be dismissed as to the legatees.[6] In a legatee's proceeding for an accounting, the other legatees, although not necessary parties, may be permitted to intervene to contest the moving legatee's claim against the estate dependent upon the construction of the will.[7] If one of several executors has been guilty of fraudulent misconduct in his dealings with the estate, his coexecutors may maintain an action for an accounting against him without joining the creditors, legatees, or next of kin.[8] The necessity or propriety of making legatees or next of kin parties sometimes depends upon statutory provisions.[9]

[§ 2372] (f) Debtors. Debtors of an estate are not generally proper parties to a suit to settle the estate;[10] but it has been held that a distributee may join in one suit the administrator and a debtor of the estate, where both are necessary parties for a settlement of the estate, and the administrator and debtor were on intimate terms with the decedent, who intrusted them with the management of her business, and each of them was indebted to the estate, and the administrator had not charged his own indebtedness nor attempted to collect that of the debtor.[11]

[§ 2373] (g) Creditors. Creditors are not indispensable parties either in proceedings by the heirs to compel an administrator to render his account[12] or on a bill by an executor against a devisee of land charged with the payment of debts,[13] although it has been held that, where the claims of creditors are made by the will a charge on the land, the creditors or some of them are necessary parties.[14] Creditors may bring action for an accounting and settlement of the estate,[15] and in a suit by a

[a] When an administrator sues to settle the estate, all creditors may treat it as their action, and, if they creditor all other creditors are proper parties,[16] and are entitled to notice to come in and prove claims.[17] Creditors who sue for an accounting need not sue separately, but any one may sue for himself and others.[18] If several suits are pending in favor of different creditors, the court will order proceedings in all the suits but one to be stayed,[19] and will require the several parties to come in under the decree of such suit so that only one account of the estate may be necessary.[20]

[§ 2374] (h) Persons with Contingent Interests. One who in a certain event may be interested in the disposition of the estate is not a necessary party to a bill brought by a beneficiary under the will against the executor praying for an account and construction of the will.[21]

[§ 2375] (i) Personal Representatives and Assignees of Necessary Parties. If the original executor or administrator is dead, his personal representative is a necessary party,[22] and in case a legatee, distributee, or other person who would have been a necessary party to the suit is dead his personal representative becomes a necessary party.[23] It has also been held that the personal representative of a deceased attorney of the administrator, for whose professional services a large amount is claimed, is a necessary party to a bill for an accounting.[24] The assignee of a legatee and next of kin is a necessary party to an action for an accounting brought by such legatee,[25] and in an action brought by executors and trustees under a will for a final settlement of their accounts and to obtain a construction of the will the assignees of a legatee are properly made parties.[26] It has been held, however, that, where there are no debts outstanding, the personal representative of a deceased distributee is not a necessary party to a bill filed by the living distributees for a settlement of the estate.[27] To a bill in equity by a devisee and legatee for the settlement of an administration and for a distribution, mortgagees of the undivided interests of other devisees are necessary parties.[28]

Death pending suit. Where an action was brought by legatees against an executor for an accounting and other legatees were made parties defendant and one of them died during the action, his personal representative was held not a necessary party to further proceedings.[29] On a bill against an administrator for settlement of the estate, an order of reference and the report thereon were not void because one of the complainants was then dead and her estate was not represented, where, when the final decree was rendered, her personal representative had been made a party and was represented.[30]

[§ 2376] (j) Intervention. Intervention in an action to sell decedent's real estate and settle his estate should be permitted where the allegations of the petition for intervention are sufficient to support a constructive trust in petitioner's favor in land to which decedent held title.[31] Sureties on the administration bond, who have been subjected to liability, may be allowed to intervene so as to receive credit for the amount paid by them.[32]

[§ 2377] (5) Bill, Petition, or Complaint. Under a statute requiring that proceedings shall be by summons and complaint neither memoranda of the evidences of debt filed in a special proceeding by a creditor against the executor for an account nor a replication can take the place of a complaint.[33] The bill or petition should show facts sufficient to authorize the interposition of equity,[34] and that there file a properly verified claim in the action, it should be treated, so far as applying limitation to it, as if filed when the action by the administrator was begun. Bryson v. Biggs, 104 SW 982, 32 KyL 159.

[b] The guardian of an infant judgment creditor of the deceased may bring a settlement action under a statute authorizing a representative, legatee, distributee, or creditor of decedent to bring such action. Beddow v. Wilson, 90 SW 228, 28 KyL 661.

[c] Claim not constituting one a creditor.—The assignee of a judgment recovered against an administrator with the will annexed of decedent for legal services rendered in the managment of the estate has no judgment which binds the estate, nor does it make the owner in law a person interested in the estate, or one entitled to maintain an application for an accounting on the theory that the claim is one for expense of administration. Carter v. Bishop, 19 S. C. L. 403.

[b] Where a bill to marshal the assets of an intestate is filed, any creditor who comes in and proves his debt, under the master's notice, becomes a party to the decree, an actor in the proceedings, and is entitled to any order to speed the cause or carry the decree into successful execution. Boyce v. Boyce, 26 S. C. Eq. 263.

[c] In North Carolina (1) a special proceeding under the statute differs from a creditor's bill in that in the latter all the creditors may make themselves parties, while in the former they are required to do so. Patterson v. Miller, 72 N. C. 516. (2) In a proceeding brought under the statute, by creditors on behalf of themselves and all other creditors to compel a personal representative to account for his administration, each complaint of the several creditors constitutes a distinct proceeding, to be proceeded in separately. is a necessity for an accounting.[35] It has been said that a petition averring that the party presenting it is the creditor of the estate, and that the full time has elapsed without an account having been filed, duly verified, is all that can be required as the basis of an order requiring an executor or administrator to file his account in the proper office.[36] In a bill by an heir, devisee, legatee, or distributee, complainant should state the right, title, or claim and all other necessary matters upon which he relies for relief with accuracy and clearness for the information both of defendant and the court.[37] Where the will bequeathed to testator's widow the use of the residue of the testator's estate, subject to certain charges, and in lieu of dower, and after testator's lands had been sold by the executor under a power of sale and the widow had received considerable sums of money from the executor under the will, she petitioned for an order requiring the executor to render an intermediate account, it was held that the failure of the widow to allege and prove performance of conditions mentioned in the will and an election by her to take under the will in lieu of dower would not defeat an accounting on her petition.[38] Where the same person is administrator of the estates of a father and son, a petition by the son's distributees asking for an accounting as to certain sums alleged to be due from the father to the son states no cause of action.[39] If a bill seeks to compel a final settlement it must aver that the estate is ready for a final settlement.[40] Specifications in a bill for the settlement of an estate brought by one executor against his coexecutors in whose control the estate was must be particular in order to obtain relief.[41] A bill which attacks a prior partial accounting should specify the items complained of.[42]

Statutory requirements as to the allegations in the bill, petition, or complaint must be fully complied with,[43] but facts other than those prescribed by statute need not be set out.[44] It is sometimes required by statute that a petition for settlement of an estate should allege the amount of decedent's debts and the nature and value of the property.[45]

Allegations of breach of duty or fraud. Allegations of fraud or mismanagement on the part of the personal representative are not necessary to the maintenance of an action for the settlement of the estate,[46] although a bill alleging fraudulent mismanagement of an estate by a personal representative shows sufficient equity to require an answer.[47] Where the action is by heirs or distributees, it is sufficient to aver a breach of duty on the part of the executor or administrator in failing to file his final account and fully to settle the estate,[48] but it has been held that a bill by a legatee or distributee must show that the statutory period allowed to the administrator to make distribution or pay legacies has run.[49]

Allegation of existence of assets. To entitle a petitioner to an accounting from the executor of a deceased executor, the petition must aver that there are assets of the estate in the hands of the second executor,[50] and a similar rule has been announced where the proceeding was against an administrator de bonis non.[51] Where a bill filed by a general creditor against the administrator and heirs does not seek to charge the real estate and subject it to

[b] Bill sufficient as against demurrer.—Complainant, an illiterate, alleged that her former husband died leaving her land worth one hundred thousand dollars, and a policy for ten thousand dollars; that she permitted defendant, her brother-in-law, to manage the estate; that defendant had fraudulently evaded reporting the crops from 1900 to 1904, and, after obtaining administration, procured from complainant a pretended deed of an undivided half interest in the estate, and a petition to release him from liability to account until ordered by the court, and to discharge him, and that to defraud complainant, he procured a signature, purporting to be hers, to a lease by which he fraudulently designed to purchase her half interest in the personal property, and to rent her half interest in the estate for ten years, with the option of buying for the inadequate sum of twenty thousand dollars, and proposed to purchase her remaining half interest for forty-five thousand dollars; that he fraudulently procured a signature, purporting to be hers and her second husband's, to a pretended deed purporting to convey to defendant all of her interest in the estate, which deed complainant never signed, etc.; that she had lost the net proceeds of the crops, the lands, worth one hundred thousand dollars, and the insurance policy, and prayed an accounting by defendant as administrator, together with the vacation of all transactions except the final sale of the land to defendant. It was held that the bill was not demurrable for want of equity. Swinney v. Cockrell, 86 Miss. 318, 38 S 353. See also Safe Deposit, etc., Co. v. 51. Rawlings v. Rawlings, (Ky.) 112 SW 862.

decedent's debts, it is bad on demurrer if it fails to show that there are assets to be administered.[52] In an action to compel an administrator to account to his successor for sums received from the sale of lands, a complaint alleging the receipt of money from the sale of real estate of the intestate and that defendant has refused to account, although often requested, and that he still has the money in his hands is sufficient.[53] Where, in an action to compel an executrix to account after she had accounted and been discharged, the petition failed to allege that any further sums came into the hands of the executrix and she specifically denied that she had received any further sums, it was held that a further accounting was properly denied.[54] Where the complaint, in an action by the heirs and distributees against an administrator for a settlement, alleged a balance due on account collected by the administrator, as shown by his annual account, and that a further sum was due from the administrator, of which plaintiffs averred that they had but recently received information, it was held that the complaint was for an accounting of any sums which the administrator should have collected.[54½]

Verification of the petition is sometimes required,[55] although lack of verification, when not detrimental to anyone interested in the estate, is not ground for reversal of a decree for settlement.[56]

The court has power to permit an amendment to a bill by the representative of a deceased executor against a coexecutor and legatees under the will for an accounting of decedent's transactions as executor, by way of a supplemental bill setting up certain facts showing complainants' right to contribution which were omitted from the original bill.[57]

[§ 2378] (6) Plea or Answer, and Defenses. A personal representative who consents to answer a bill in equity, or, having pleaded, is ordered to answer, must answer fully;[58] and he is properly compelled to account where the answer does not raise an issue in bar of an accounting.[59] When an administrator is called on to account in a court of equity he may exhibit with his answer a copy of the final account;[60] but it has been held that he cannot be compelled to exhibit his account,[61] although there is authority to the contrary.[62] If a personal representative charges himself in a schedule to his answer he cannot discharge himself by another schedule to the same answer stating his disbursements.[63] The administrator may defend by pleading and showing that he has fully administered,[64] that he has properly paid over or expended a certain sum in question,[65] or that he has delivered the assets to his successor.[66] That plaintiff has parted with all his interest in the estate is a perfect defense to his petition for an accounting,[67] but the fact that pending proceedings defendant's letters were revoked is no defense to his liability to account.[68] The pendency of another suit concerning property in which the estate is largely interested and the fact that a sale of the property would result in a sacrifice are not valid objections to the maintenance of a bill by devisees to remove the administration into a court of equity and compel a settlement.[69]

Account stated. If the representative pleads to an action by a legatee an account stated between himself and the legatee, the plea must show that the legatee was present when the account was made up and that he examined and approved it.[70] Where an administrator de bonis non with the will annexed was sued by alleged legatees of the testator, who averred that the testator's original executor had died without having fully administered the testator's estate, that plaintiffs had requested defendant to require the administrator of the deceased executor to account, and that he had refused, a plea by defendant that a full and complete accounting and settlement to and with each other for, and on account of, any money, goods, and chattels belonging to the estate of the testator which went into or should have gone into the hands of his original executor had been had between himself and the administrator of the deceased executor, and that in such settlement the correct balance was ascertained and payment made, constituted a good plea in bar of the action, and hence it was error to order a reference before disposition was made of the plea.[71]

A claim for certain credits which the probate court has authorized the administratrix to take at some future settlement to be filed by her cannot be made in an action by creditors to have certain lands, which have been redeemed by the general assets, subjected to the payment of their debts, when she has not asked for a credit in any settlement and her administration is still open.[72]

Settlement of foreign administrator. Where a foreign administrator, pending the litigation against him for an accounting, settles his accounts in the forum of his appointment, such settlement will be conclusive on the rights of the parties.[73]

Pleading limitations. In order to defeat a proceeding to compel him to account on the ground of limitations, the executor or administrator must allege in his answer not only the requisite lapse of time but also that such lapse occurred after the repudiation by him of the trust relation.[74]

When allegations of answer taken as true. Where a bill against executors for a second accounting after one final settlement does not specify errors, and the executors answer, giving a full account of their administration, and there is a decree for an account, the allegations of their answer, although affirmative, must be taken as true, unless disproved, so far as they relate directly to the accounts which they are thus required to give, and if in such a case plaintiff does not amend his bill and specify errors in the accounts, allegations in the answer, although not explanatory of the account, and therefore perhaps not within the scope of the discovery sought by the bill, but having a relation to the subject matter of the account, and important to a correct understanding of the motives of the executors and of the circumstances under which they acted, unless disproved, are to be taken as true.[75]

Mode of objection for insufficiency. Insufficiency of the answer cannot be set up in exceptions but must be taken advantage of by demurrer or replication.[76]

[§ 2379] (7) Issues, Proof, and Variance. In order to entitle a party seeking an accounting to relief, the allegations and proof must correspond.[77] The rule that the evidence must be confined to the issues raised by the pleading[78] is applicable to an action for an accounting and settlement of an estate;[79] but where a bill for a general account of the administration is filed by a specific legatee, he is not confined to evidence as to the specified allegations in the bill as he would be in a bill to surcharge and falsify an account or to reopen a settlement.[80] An immaterial variance between pleading and proof may be disregarded.[81]

[§ 2380] (8) Evidence—(a) Presumptions. As a general rule the answer of the personal representative, when responsive in its averments, should be assumed to be true,[82] but an allegation by way of defense which is not responsive to the bill is not to be regarded as proved until rebutted by two witnesses or equivalent evidence, as is the rule in equity.[83] Where no distinct and clear accounts have been kept by an executor, doubts which arise must be taken most strongly against him, and against his personal representatives.[84]

[§ 2381] (b) Burden of Proof. Ordinarily where the existence of assets is put in issue, the burden of proof rests upon the party seeking an accounting,[85] although under a vague and unsatisfactory answer it may not be incumbent on complainant to show that debts due the estate had been collected or were collectable.[86] If it is shown that the representative has assets in his hands the burden is on him to account for the funds,[87] and where plaintiffs show an indebtedness due the estate, the administrator has the burden of proving that he used due diligence to collect it and was unable to do so,[88] or, having collected it, has accounted for it.[89] An administrator who paid for a street improvement for which his intestate was not legally liable has the burden of proving, when sued by the heirs, that the fund appropriated to its payment had been set apart by intestate for that purpose.[90] Distributees to whom an executor submitted his accounts to further an amicable settlement and who retained them for nearly a year without question will have the burden cast on them to surcharge and falsify the accounts,[91] but distributees who had no connection with the examination of the accounts will not be affected.[92] The books of a firm are prima facie evidence against a surviving partner who is executor of the deceased member of the firm, and it is incumbent upon the executor to show what corrections, if any, should be made.[93]

Fraud. Where fraud is alleged by plaintiff, the burden rests on him to establish the charge,[94] but where fraud has been shown, the burden rests on the representative to show that he has reaped no benefit therefrom.[95]

Birth of posthumous child. Where a widow, who acted as administratrix of her deceased husband, who died leaving as his only relatives the widow, his father and mother, and sisters and a brother, sought to defeat the petition of the father for a compulsory accounting by showing birth of a posthumous child, she had the burden of proving that she gave birth to a child born alive.[96]

[§ 2382] (c) Admissibility. In a suit in equity brought by a legatee against an executor for account and distribution, if the answer of the executor is vague and unsatisfactory, many years having elapsed since the transaction took place, great latitude should be allowed in offering evidence to charge the executor, and all evidence, not positively illegal, tending even remotely to elucidate the case should be admitted.[97] It is competent for heirs and distributees, suing the administrator for a settlement, to show any indebtedness due the estate,[98] and the admission of an administrator made in writing but not under oath, that he has collected assets, is evidence against him in an action to which he is a party.[99] In a suit by legatees against an executor for an accounting and payment of their legacies, evidence that some of the heirs at law did not know of or authorize a settlement pleaded by the executor in bar of the suit is admissible on the issue made in regard to the bona fides of the settlement.[1] The testimony of an executor that the life tenant of the estate objected to his suing upon a note due the estate is competent as bearing upon his bona fides as to its collection.[2] In a proceeding by an administrator de bonis non against the representative of the former administrator to compel final settlement of the first administration, the records of the court, containing a partial settlement, are admissible.[3] Where certain creditors of an estate by note received payments thereon and agreed to release the administrator from personal liability on account of a previous improper payment of a note barred by the statute of limitations, such notes were not admissible, in a subsequent suit by a creditor by account against the administrator, to show outstanding debts of higher dignity than plaintiff's.[4] In an action by the heirs and distributees of a decedent against his administrator for a settlement, plaintiffs were entitled to show that a former administrator had received a specified sum as proceeds on a sale of decedent's real estate, pursuant to the order of court, and, on the evidence, being admitted, defendant was obliged to show that he had used diligence to collect it, and, having done so, had accounted for it.[5] In suit by distributees against the administrator for an accounting and settlement, alleging that he had dominated intestate and by fraud and undue influence had obtained money from her, evidence that he influenced intestate's general conduct by threats and acts of violence, etc., was admissible.[6] In an action by the permanent administratrix against a temporary administrator for an accounting as to personalty of intestate, an agreement between the widow and the temporary administrator conferring authority on the latter as to the disposal of property of intestate is irrelevant.[7] Vouchers or official copies of them may be controverted by parol evidence.[8]

Value of bonds. The parties seeking an account are not compelled to take the price realized at a sale of certain bonds and stocks by the administrator, as conclusive evidence of value, but may prove the market quotations of value at different times.[9]

Financial condition of representative. Where the representative was charged with antecedent obligations to decedent, a statement made by him in his application to a surety company to become surety on his bond, showing his solvency, was admissible in evidence against him on the question of his solvency at the time of his appointment,[10] and the number of docketed judgments in his favor was also competent along with evidence of the extent and value of his estate.[11]

[§ 2383] (d) Weight and Sufficiency. In a creditor's bill against an administrator, when it is found upon a reference to ascertain the debts that the fund is sufficient to pay such debts, a judgment against the administrator, or the admission of the debt, is taken as full proof, for the reason that the other creditors are not interested in the matter.[12] Where evidence is conflicting as to whether an administrator paid a claim out of the estate funds or with his own money, a finding that estate funds were used for that purpose will not be disturbed.[13] Where, in an action by an administrator for a settlement of his intestate's estate and seeking to recover of defendant certain property which he alleged belonged to the estate, defendant admitted that the property once belonged to decedent, but alleged that he purchased it from him for a valuable consideration a short time before his death, evidence tending to show a gift of the property by decedent to defendant's wife failed altogether to sustain the allegations of the answer.[14] Reference is made in the note to decisions in which the courts have passed upon the sufficiency of evidence with respect to such matters as failure to account,[15] settlement with decedent of a claim,[16] failure of an administrator to make a final settlement during his life,[17] fraud in procuring a decree of distribution which discharged the representative,[18] the character of a pretended absolute purchase of property as a conveyance to the administrator as security for money advanced by him,[19] a transfer of trust funds by executors to themselves as trustees,[20] the assumption by decedent, through an agent, of the sole management and control of certain properties,[21] and acquirement by the representative of possession of certain gold coin buried by decedent.[22]

[§ 2384] (9) Trial, Hearing, and Determination. Where a petition by legatees and the answer involved questions of the removal of the executor, his liability to account, and an accounting, it was proper for the court to take testimony on all these questions and decide them by one decree.[23] In an action against an administrator and another, beneficiaries under the will, for the administrator's failure to account for notes executed by him to the testator, the only issue being as to whether testator had given the notes to the administrator's codefendant, the question of value was immaterial, and it was not error for the court in its instructions to assume that they were worth their face value.[24] The court has a reasonable discretion as to whether it will order an accounting.[25]

Direction of verdict. Where an administrator's return was never approved by the ordinary, and his answer in a proceeding by heirs to compel a settlement admitted that he had received a certain amount in cash, a directed verdict against him for such amount, less an item admitted to be correct, was proper.[26]

Reference. Where a good plea in bar of an accounting has been interposed, it is improper to order a reference until such plea has been disposed of.[27] The report of a master to whom the cause was referred was not subject to objection because it did not contain a complete statement of the executors' account in debtor or creditor form, where it contained itemized exhibits and schedules which, in connection with the inventory and settlements made by the executors, afforded more complete information than such a statement would have done.[28]

[§ 2385] (10) Dismissal. Where no question as to the sufficiency of the petition was ever submitted to the court, or even raised upon the record, it was error to dismiss the petition pending a motion for a reference to a master commissioner.[29] Where, in a suit by testator's grandchildren against the executrix of the estate of testator's widow for settlement of his estate and a division of his personal property between the grandchildren, on the theory that his will passed only a life estate to his widow, it appeared on demurrer that testator had no personal property at the time of his death, and that there was therefore no estate to settle, the suit was properly dismissed.[30] Where accounts involved in the settlement of an estate are in confusion, and the evidence as to them conflicting, the court may refuse to adjust the accounts and leave the parties where by their manner of dealing they have placed themselves.[31]

[§ 2386] (11) Judgment or Decree. Where a bill for removal of the administration of an estate from the probate to the chancery court presents several contested points, affecting the administration, for determination, complainants are entitled to a decree on such of the contested points presented as are sustained by the proofs.[32] Where the petition contains a demand for an accounting and the removal of the administrator, the judgment may validly decree his removal, and that he shall pay a certain sum of money for which he is liable to the estate.[33] Where testator gave a certain sum to his niece to be put out at interest, the interest to be paid to her annually during the lifetime of her husband and at his death, should she outlive him, the principal to be paid to her, and the executor of the testator paid the interest to the niece until his death, and the administrator of the executor paid to the administrator de bonis non of the testator the sum given to the niece in Confederate money, and thereafter the niece died leaving her husband surviving, it was held, in a suit by the husband and others for a settlement in which the administrator de bonis non of the testator was not a party, that it was error to direct an inquiry as to what he had done with the Confederate money paid to him by the administrator of the executor, but the decree against the administrator of the executor should be without prejudice to his right to proceed against the administrator de bonis non for an accounting.[34]

Directing payment of debts. So long as decrees of reference entered in a suit to settle the estate of a decedent are not fully executed, and the data are not arrived at whereby an accurate account can be made for the final distribution of the assets of the estate, it is proper for the commissioner to whom the cause has been referred to include in his report any outstanding valid debt against the estate and for the court to decree payment of such debt.[35] Where on a bill by a creditor against an executor and the legatees there is a dispute between the executor and the legatees as to whether he should pay the creditor without contribution from them, he will be decreed to pay the debt from his own goods and left to his remedy at law against the legatees, where it appears that he has paid them enough to satisfy the debt.[36]

Setting aside conveyance and directing sale. Where plaintiff furnished part of the money to purchase land and make improvements thereon, the title being taken by plaintiff's sister, who thereafter conveyed to decedent, her mother, and plaintiff claimed that a note given her for the money was executed by decedent, while defendants claimed that the sister executed it, and the land was all the sister had that was subject to her debts, and under the express provisions of the statute, the conveyance was void as to her creditors, although valid as between the parties thereto, it was held in an action by plaintiff as creditor to settle decedent's estate, making the latter's executor and her devisees, including the sister parties defendant, that the court should have adjudged the conveyance void, in so far as it affected plaintiff's right to subject the land to her debt, and to that end should have decreed a sale of the property, it being indivisible.[37]

In whose favor decree may run. A decree against an administrator who has resigned, rendered in favor of "the present administrator de bonis non," is void when there is no such administrator in existence.[38] A final decree should not be rendered in favor of one of complainants as guardian ad litem of a certain person where such person is not a party and is not shown to have any interest in the estate.[39] But in a suit by a part of the distributees and heirs at law of an intestate against his administrator, the court has power, after determining the fund due from the administrator, to decree the separate sums due from such fund to the several distributees of the estate, although many of such distributees were not named as complainants in the bill.[40]

Against whom decree may run. Where the sureties of an administrator are made parties and duly notified, the judgment should be rendered against the administrator and the sureties.[41]

Character of decree as final. A decree in a suit to settle a decedent's estate, adopting certain specific portions of the commissioner's report, directing the payment of certain specified debts and a partial distribution of the assets of the estate among the legatees, requiring such legatees to give refunding bonds, and recommitting the cause to a master to take a further account and not confirming the report, is not a final decree, such as to preclude a creditor from thereafter coming into the cause and asserting a demand against the estate.[42]

Effect of decree. A decree against an executor and his sureties and their personal representatives in favor of the testator's legatees and creditors, in a suit for the settlement and distribution of the estate, is conclusive on the question whether or not a claim asserted in such suit was barred by the statute of limitations.[43] On a bill by an executor to administer the assets for the payment of decedent's debts, which states that a person named claims a debt against the estate, and makes such person a formal party, if he does not appear, and a decree is made not allowing his debts, and subjecting the land of the estate to the payment of other debts, such person is concluded by the decree.[44]

[§ 2387] (12) Appeal. Ordinarily, under the statutes, an appeal lies in an action for the settlement of a decedent's estate.[45] But where, in such an action, the administrator set up no individual claim to certain real estate alleged to belong to deceased, either by pleading or otherwise, in the trial court, he is not entitled to claim such property on an appeal in his individual capacity.[46] Where the creditors of an estate in progress of settlement in chancery are required by an order of court to come in and prove their debts, they become quasi parties to the cause, and may appeal and assign error on account of the rejection of their claims.[47]

[§ 2388] (13) Stay of Other Actions or Proceedings pending Accounting. After equity has taken jurisdiction of the settlement of an estate and of the accounting of the executor or administrator, proceedings by him to settle an account in the probate court are of no effect;[48] and after a bill has been filed against an executor or administrator he cannot at the same time be proceeded against at law[49] or in the surrogate's court[50] for the same purpose.[51] It has been held, however, that an action to determine a matter connected with an accounting, which action is pending in another court, need not suspend proceedings in the surrogate's court.[52] A decree for an account in one creditor's suit operates as a suspension of all other pending suits, for the other creditors may come in under the decree[53] inasmuch as the account is for the benefit of all.[54] From the date of the decree an injunction will be granted as a matter of course on motion of either party[55] and on due disclosure of assets[56] to stay all proceedings of any creditor at law.[57] But an injunction will not issue until an account has been decreed.[58]

[§ 2389] (14) Execution. A decree against the executor or administrator for the payment of money is enforceable by execution against his goods,[59] not against the goods and chattels of decedent.[60] When

[a] On a bill by a beneficiary against the executor of a trustee for an accounting, the beneficiary is entitled to an execution as at common law against the estate of the trustee in the hands of the executor for the principal sum found due, and another execution for costs against the executor personally. Taft v. Stow, 174 Mass. 171, 54 NE 506 [foll Tyler v. Brigham, 143 Mass. 410, 9 NE 750].

60. Matter of Waring, 7 Misc. 502, judgment is obtained against the personal property of decedent, the execution should not run against his personal representatives.[61] No execution can be issued on a void decree.[62] Execution may be ordered against an administrator personally if he makes a vague and insufficient answer to a rule taken by creditors whose claims have been fixed by a final judgment upon the administrator's account.[63]

[§ 2390] (15) Costs. Since it is the right of the persons who are beneficiaries of the estate to have an account and settlement from the administrator they cannot be compelled to pay the costs incurred in settling the estate,[64] but costs are sometimes allowed against an executor or administrator who has neglected his duty.[65] It has also been held proper to allow costs to neither party as against the other,[66] and in a proper case costs may be paid out of the estate.[67] Where a court's order assessing all costs previously incurred in an action by heirs against an administrator against such heirs, as a condition to setting aside a dismissal of the action for the heirs' failure to prosecute, was not set aside or appealed from, the court had no power after the term to adjudge such costs against the administrator.[68]

The executor of a deceased executor cannot be personally charged with the costs of a proceeding to compel him to account as to the estate of which his testator was executor, where he had received no property as executor and has been guilty of no misappropriation of funds or wrongdoing.[69]

[§ 2391] (16) Counsel Fees. A representative is entitled on the settlement of his accounts in equity to an allowance for reasonable counsel fees for services rendered in a suit instituted by him for a settlement and distribution when the condition of the estate and the conflicting trusts united in his person rendered it necessary to resort to a court of equity,[70] but the fees of attorneys employed by the representatives to resist a settlement should not be paid out of the estate.[71] Fees of counsel for services rendered solely for the benefit of a legatee[72] or one claiming to be such,[73] or a creditor who brings an action for a settlement,[74] will not be paid out of the estate, although it has been held that counsel fees will be allowed where the action results in benefit to all the legatees,[75] or to the estate,[76] or was prosecuted by one of the heirs for the benefit of all.[77] It has been held that the court has jurisdiction to rule the administrator to pay to the attorney for devisees a proper compensation for his services rendered to them and at their instance in an action brought by the administrator against them for a settlement.[78]

[§ 2392] D. Charges. In his account the representative should be charged with moneys and other assets of the estate which he has received,[79] al-

[a] Sale in violation of order of court.—An administrator sued for an accounting is properly charged with the appraised value of property sold in violation of an order of sale fixing that amount as the upset price, when the appraisement given in evidence against him is the only evidence of value introduced. Epperson v. Jackson, 83 S. C. 157, 65 SE 217.

[b] Difference in appraisements.—Where there was no evidence that certain goods accounted for by an administratrix were not all the goods which had been received by her intestate, a difference in the estimated value thereof, as appraised by two distinct sets of appraisers, was insufficient to justify a surcharge of the amount of such difference. [a] Illustration.—An administrator sold decedent's business to the widow for five thousand five hundred dollars, and was ordered to distribute four thousand five hundred dollars to the heirs. About the same time, he organized a corporation with fifteen thousand dollars capital stock, and the widow conveyed the business to it. He delivered four thousand five hundred dollars in stock at par value to the heirs, and credited himself with that amount. It was held that the heirs, on discovering the stock to be substantially worthless, could return it to him and require him to ac-out awaiting a final accounting.[94] Where a testator directs his executor to sell certain property or rights, the executor cannot be surcharged with an additional amount which he could have obtained by exceeding his powers under the will.[95] An administrator who pays out money under an order of the county court cannot be personally charged with reimbursement of it, in absence of evidence that the order was obtained by fraud, and that he had guilty knowledge thereof.[96]

Debts of representative to decedent are chargeable in his account as cash,[97] although he may of course contest the indebtedness.[98]

Property not delivered. An administrator is chargeable in his annual account with property which he, as lessee under a lease with his intestate, agreed to deliver to him at a certain time, where he failed to make such delivery to himself as administrator.[99]

Losses. Where culpable loss occurs, the representative should be required to debit himself with the amount;[1] and a payment or expenditure made by the representative improperly or without authority is a loss within this rule;[2] but where the loss was excusable, he may leave the amount out of his account altogether, or, if it is charged to him, have a corresponding credit allowed.[3]

Personal profits. As any personal profit which the representative has made out of his dealings with the property of the estate belongs to the estate,[4] he is chargeable with such profits in his accounts.[5]

Realty; rents and profits. The representative is not as a rule properly chargeable in his account with the rent of his decedent's realty, for if he takes charge of the realty without some testamentary or statutory authority and collects the rents he acts merely as agent of the heirs and does not bind himself in his fiduciary capacity, or if he is a mere wrongdoer as against the heirs he is not amenable to the probate court;[6] but where any rents or profits are received by him in his fiduciary capacity he is of course chargeable therewith.[7] Where an administrator, who was also an heir, agreed with the other heirs that he should rent the lands and credit the proceeds on his account, he should charge himself with his share of the rent as well as of the other heirs.[8] An executor who under a power in the will has sold mortgaged land of the estate to pay the debts, and in order to give a clear title has paid off the encumbrance with the proceeds of the sale, should in his account simply charge himself with the balance.[9] Under an agreement between the administrator and the heir of deceased that the administrator shall collect the rents of the real estate and pay debts of the estate with the proceeds, also the costs of repairing and keeping the real estate in condition, he is to apply on the debts of the estate, and therefore to account for only the net income of the property as a whole, that within and without the state.[10] An administrator being entitled to the possession of his decedent's land only as assets for the payment of debts is not accountable for waste in his settlement, however he may be otherwise.[11]

Property received from decedent during his lifetime. The representative may sometimes be charged with money or property received from decedent during his lifetime, where no transfer of title was intended;[12] but it is otherwise where such money or property was received in payment of an indebtedness or it otherwise appears that it was intended to pass the title.[13]

Mere choses in action. The representative should not be charged with debts, choses in action, proceeds of sale, or the like, until he has received the money,[14] unless the amount has been lost through his negligence or lack of good faith in failing to collect.[15]

Interest. Where the circumstances are such as to warrant holding the representative liable for interest on funds of the estate,[16] such interest is properly made a charge against him in his account. In a proper case the representative may be charged with interest on funds of the estate.[17]

Effect of charges in settlement; mistake. An executor who in his settlement charges himself with assets is responsible therefor at the demand of heirs or creditors of the estate;[18] but a mistake in the account, in charging himself with items which he did not owe, or amounts which he did not receive, should be corrected on the settlement of the account,[19] and an administrator who has improperly charged himself with the value of stock not constituting assets of the estate is entitled to withdraw the charge from his account.[20]

Trust property. Where the will created a trust and the executor set aside the amount stipulated, lending it upon alleged insufficient security, without asking credit therefor in his account, the heirs were not entitled to complain that the security was inadequate and have the executor charged therewith, since a final decree allowing the account would have charged him as trustee, and not as executor, so that the cestui, if the security was inadequate, could recover from him and not from the estate, and the heirs were therefore not interested.[21]

[§ 2393] E. Credits. The representative should receive credit for all proper disbursements, as in the payment of claims or authorized expenditures;[22]

Can.—Darling v. Brown, 2 Can. S. C. 26.

[a] The representative should not be charged with: (1) Foreign debts which he could not collect. Bridgeport Trust Co.'s App., 77 Conn. 657, 60 A 662; Governor v. Williams, 25 N. [c] Debts inventoried as doubtful are not even prima facie chargeable in the account. Gay v. Grant, 101 N. C. 206, 8 SE 99, 106.

[d] Indirect purchase by representative. — An administrator who procured a bidder to buy his intestate's land at a sale made by himself as administrator, and after making a deed to the bidder took a reconveyance to himself individually and reported to the court that the land brought a certain sum is chargeable with such sum and interest from the date of the sale, although no money passed in either transaction and he disclaimed purchasing the land on his own account and immediately after the conveyance to himself contracted to sell to others at a less price. [a] Disbursements for which credit will be allowed are "unavoidable payments of money without which the estate of the testator cannot be collected and disposed of for the benefit of his creditors. Funeral charges, charges for the probate of the will or granting letters of administration, recording of inventories, accounts of sales, orders of sales, and the charges of suits legally brought for the benefit of the estate, or of defending suits brought against them, and the like charges and disbursements, are allowable; but expenses in travelling and remaining at court, and others of a similar nature, are not allowable." Stephenson v. Stephenson, 3 Hayw. (Tenn.) 123, 124.

[b] Credit should be allowed for: (1) Payments beneficial to the estate. Albert v. Sanford, 201 Mo. 117, 99 SW 1068. (2) Payment of arrears of interest on mortgage. Darrah's Est., 6 Pa. [c] Judgment against representative as such.—(1) An executor or administrator is entitled to credit for an amount paid in settlement of a judgment rendered against him in his representative capacity. Parks v. McDaniel, 75 S. C. 7, 9, 54 SE 801, 117 AmSR 878 ("When a payment is made pursuant to the judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction against the fiduciary, it is not the voluntary act of the fiduciary, but a compliance with the mandate of the court under compulsion. When such a payment is assailed the question is not merely whether the fiduciary was negligent in the conduct of the suit leading to the judgment, but whether he acted in such bad faith towards his trust or in such utter disregard of his duty as would warrant a court in setting aside the judgment or in depriving him of any equitable right to be subrogated to the position of judgment creditor, or in treating the judgment as of no avail as a protection for its payment. In such case the burden of proof is upon the party assailing the payment of the judgment, at least to show the invalidity of the claim, and that the judgment was the result of the fiduciary's breach of duty"). (2) Where a judgment was obtained against an executor by default, it will be allowed as a credit in his settlement where he moved for leave to answer after time, and, at the ensuing term, moved to open judgment because of his excusable neglect, and both motions were refused. Parks v. McDaniel, supra.

[d] Where creditors purchase at an executor's sale and credit the purchase price on their claims the executor is entitled to a corresponding credit on his account. Boyd v. Boyd, 9 SW 842, 10 KyL 85.

[e] Where it is shown that a debt of decedent was paid after his death, the representative is entitled to credit therefor, even though there is nothing to indicate by whom the payment was made. Williamson's Est., 6 WklyNC (Pa.) 452, 471.

(2) No allowance can be made for obligations incurred by the representative in the management of the estate but which have not been actually paid at the time when the account is presented and before his letters are revoked. In re Blair, 49 App. Div. 417, 63 NYS 678 [mod and aff 28 Misc. 611, 59 NYS 1090].

[g] Payment must have been on behalf of estate.—An executor is not entitled to a credit for a balance due upon a mortgage given by testator in the absence of evidence that he has paid the sum due as an obligation of the estate. Matter of Tisdale, 110 App. Div. 857, 97 NYS 494.

[h] Payments without order of court, if proper, may be allowed as credits. In re Bottoms, 156 Cal. 129, 103 P 849; Mayer v. Schneider, 122 Ill. A. 48; Hansell v. Hickox, 121 La. 721, 46 S 784.

[i] Payment by setting off against debt due estate.—(1) Where executors seek to credit themselves with the payment of a debt owed by the estate by offsetting such debt against one due the estate, they must show that such offset has actually been allowed and credit given the estate. In re Archer, 23 NYS 1041, Pow. Surr. 292. (2) But where the persons interested in a decedent's estate knew that the special administrator allowed a set-off against an account due intestate, and approved of the adjustment when such administrator's account was settled, they cannot after his death deny his power to allow the set-off and charge it to his estate. Foster v. Stone, 67 Vt. 336, 31 A 841.

[j] Crediting amounts due the executor from the estate on a note from the executor to the testator is a sufficient payment to entitle the executor to credit for the amounts. In re Morgan, 152 Wis. 138, 139 NW 745.

[k] Purchase of interest of tenant.—Where an executor was authorized to conduct certain farming operations on testator's land pending settlement of the estate, and by reason of a failure of crops for a particular year the tenants threatened to abandon it, and the executor found it necessary to take charge of them, and for this purpose bought the tenants' interest therein, he was properly credited with the amounts paid out for the purchase of such interest. Lambertson v. Vann, 134 N. C. 108, 46 SE 10.

[l] Where a guardian was also executor of a will in which his ward was residuary legatee, and he paid out for the support of his ward as appeared by his guardianship account, as allowed, more than he received as guardian, the excess should be credited to him in his executor's account as paid over to himself as guardian and charged to him in his guardianship account, and if this was not done in form, the excess should be deducted from the liability of the executor and his sureties on his bond. Mattoon v. Cowing, 13 Gray (Mass.) 387.

[m] Necessary showing as to credit claimed.—A credit claimed by an administratrix for the keeping of a colt belonging to the estate, without the showing of the expense of keeping it, is properly rejected. In re Irwin, 152 Iowa 323, 131 NW 57.

[n] Failure to require the statutory affidavit of correctness of a claim paid does not deprive the representative of the right to credit for the payment thereof, if the claim was in fact a just one. Commercial State Bank v. Ross, 90 Kan. 423, 133 P 538.

[o] The representative may waive his right to credit for reimbursement for payment of debts of the estate with his own funds in favor of the distributees of the estate. Bates v. Vary, 40 Ala. 421.

[p] Assignment of mortgage securing debt.—Where a testator, by his will, directs that certain debts, for which the testator is secondarily responsible, and which are secured by mortgage upon lands of the original debtor, shall be paid, and that the not made out of funds of the estate but he used his own funds for the purpose.[23] Where the payment itself was a proper one the representative is not to be denied credit because the payment was made at an improper time,[24] or involved an excess of authority.[25] The representative can receive no credit for disbursements which he made improperly, such as the payment of claims not existing or not properly established or allowed, or unauthorized expenditures.[26] But where the representative has settled a claim against the estate in good faith and from a reasonable fear that litigation for its enforcement might go against the estate, he should be credited with the sum paid, although the claim is afterward shown to have had no foundation.[27] On filing a second account the representative is entitled to credit for any balance due him on the first.[28] Where the representative turns over money of the mortgages shall be charged to a specific share in the distribution of his estate, the executors will not be allowed credit for the payment of those debts until they secure assignments of the mortgages, and are in position to charge themselves with those mortgages for the purposes of distribution. Hurlbut v. Hutton, 44 N. J. Eq. 302, 15 A 417.

[q] Disbursements before letters were granted will not be allowed unless they were necessary and from the nature of the circumstances could not properly have been postponed. Samuel v. Thomas, 51 Wis. 549, 8 NW 361.

[r] Debts paid after a decree to account should not be allowed to the administrator, but he is entitled to stand in the place of the creditors paid. Jones v. Jukes, 2 Ves. Jr. 517, 30 Reprint 753.

estate to his successor he is entitled to credit therefor in his accounts,[29] and the same is true where he himself takes charge of funds as representative of another estate and duly charges himself with and accounts for the same as representative of the latter estate.[30] Where a fine is imposed on the representative for the benefit of creditors, he is entitled to credit for the amount of it when paid;[31] but where the amount of a decree against an administrator is collected from one of his sureties and distributed and the decree is subsequently reversed, the administrator is not entitled to credit for the amount collected, pending an action by the surety against the administrator de bonis non to recover such amount.[32]

Losses and depreciation. The representative may, to offset charges against him as for assets received, receive credit for articles lost, for depreciation, and for debts due the estate which have not been collected, if the loss or depreciation is not due to his negligence or bad faith;[33] and where property in the possession of the representative as assets has been delivered by him to persons who have been judicially declared to be the owners thereof, the representative is properly credited therewith.[34] The representative is not entitled to credit for money paid out on a judgment obtained on a doubtful claim where there is no evidence of diligent resistance or genuine good faith in the effort to defeat the claim.[35]

[a] Uncollected debts.—(1) If debts which have been charged to the executor or administrator prove uncollectable and their loss is not attributable in any way to his fault or neglect, he is entitled to credit for the amount. Stong v. Wilkson, 14 Mo. 116; In re Jones, 5 NYLegObs 124, 1 Redf. Surr. 263; Cline's App., 106 Pa. 617. (2) But credit for uncollected debts will not be allowed where the loss was the result of negligence, as in case of failure to sue the debtors within a reasonable time, although there was no bad faith. (3) No credit will be allowed where the claim which was lost had not been charged to the executor or administrator as part of the assets of the estate. Mahon v. Bower, 2 Miss. 275. (4) Nor will credit be allowed on account of the insolvency of the obligor in a note where the administrators did not produce the note and had made two settlements without claiming credit for it. Amos v. Heatherby, 7 Dana (Ky.) 45.

[b] Losses on sales.—(1) In case loss results on a sale of property of the estate, the executor or administrator is entitled to credit for the amount thereof, if it was not caused by his neglect or misconduct. Ex p. Jones, 13 F. Cas. No. 7,443, 4 Cranch C. C. 185; Matter of Wagner, 40 Misc. 490, 82 NYS 797, 3 Mills Surr. 506; In re Moore, 198 Pa. 611, 48 A 884. (2) But he must show that the loss was without his fault, in order to entitle him to such credit. Underhill v. Newburger, 4 Redf. Surr. (N. Y.) 499. (3) The difference between the par value of securities and a less amount for which they were sold is properly allowed a representative in the absence of evidence that they were sold for less than their market value. Ladd v. Stephens, 147 Mo. 319, 48 SW 915.

[c] Depreciation of values.—If the market value of a commodity belonging to the estate falls while in the hands of the executor or administrator, he is not liable for the former value if his failure to obtain it was not caused by his negligence or misconduct. Clary v. Sanders, 43 Ala. 287; Matter of Thompson, 41 Misc. 420, 84 NYS 1111, 4 Mills Surr. 69 [aff 87 App. Div. 609 mem, 83 NYS 1117 mem (aff 178 N. Y. 554 mem, 71 NE 1140 mem)]; Van Winkle v. [d] If property has perished since the administration was granted the appraised value thereof will be credited to the administrator. Edelen v. Edelen, 11 Md. 415.

[f] Losses resulting from continuing decedent's business (1) will in a proper case be allowed as a credit in the account, as where the executor or administrator carried on the business in good faith, at the request of all the persons interested in the estate. Poole v. Munday, 103 Mass. 174; Smith's Est., 30 PittsbLeg JNS (Pa.) 188. (2) Where decedent's interest in a partnership could not have been converted into money without considerable loss, the administratrix, decedent's widow, was not chargeable with losses resulting from allowing the surviving partner to continue the business on paying interest on the value of decedent's share. Browne v. Bedford, 4 Dem. Surr. (N. Y.) 304. (3) But where the business was highly speculative in character and the administrator continued it without consultation with the creditors and without an order of court, but merely on the advice of the next of kin, and heavy losses resulted, he was not allowed credit. Shinn's Est., 166 Pa. 121, 30 A 1026, 1030, 45 AmSR 656.

[g] Satisfaction of lien on personalty of estate.—Where the representative satisfies a lien on personalty of the estate, and on a sale of it receives less than the amount so paid out, he is not chargeable for the loss, if he acted in good faith. In re Armstrong, 125 Cal. 603, 58 P 183.

[h] Losses caused by neglect.—An executor or administrator who has once actually received funds of a decedent cannot discharge himself from accounting for them by showing that they were lost by his own neglect. Lindsley v. Dodd, 53 N. J. Eq. 69, 73, 30 A 896 [rev on other grounds 53 N. J. Eq. 652, 33 A 963] ("This proposition seems so self-evident as to require no authority to support it").

[i] The cause of the loss must be stated in the account, because the surrogate is to pass on the sufficiency of the excuse offered, that is, whether the loss was without the fault of the executor or administrator. In re Jones, 5 NYLegObs 124, 1 Redf. Surr. 263.

[j] The oath of the representative is prima facie proof of worthlessness or loss of assets. Van Winkle v. Blackford, 54 W. Va. 621, 46 SE 589.

[a] Property claimed and recovered by third persons.—Where property with which an administrator has charged himself is afterward recovered by third persons, the administrator is entitled to credit for it. Dyer v. Jacoway, 50 Ark. 217, 6 SW 902.

[b] Assets taken from representative by receiver.—Where partnership assets inventoried by the representative have been taken into the possession of a receiver, he is entitled to credit therefor in his account. Kalbfell's Est., 30 PittsbLeg JNS 273 [aff 17 Pa. Super. 255].

35. Matter of Watson, 115 App. Div. 310, 100 NYS 993 [aff 187 N. Y. 541 mem, 80 NE 1122 mem]; Matter of Yetter, 44 App. Div. 404, 61 NYS 175 [aff 162 N. Y. 615, 57 NE 1129].

Expenses, compensation, commissions, etc. The expenses of administration may be allowed to the representative in his account,[36] and he should also be allowed credit for the compensation to which he is entitled,[37] although where the taking of commissions by an executor was premature the sum taken should, for purposes of accounting, be regarded as still in his hands.[38] Where an administrator has collected rents and has made disbursements for repairs, insurance, and taxes on real estate, he should not be allowed for such disbursements without accounting for the rents.[39] Where an executor expends estate funds in the preservation of property of the estate, he should be given credit for the money realized out of such property by reason of such preservation,[40] although the court reserves until final accounting the question whether such expenditures were necessary.[41]

Reimbursements to third persons. Where on the accounting it appears that items of expenditure for which credit is claimed were actually paid by a third person, the representative may show that he repaid such person out of the funds of the estate, and upon such showing the credit claimed will be allowed.[42]

Widow's allowance or dower. A widow, accounting as administratrix, should be credited with the amount set apart to her by appraisers as her allowance or exemption, where there is no evidence that she did not receive it.[43] Where an executor sells real estate to the widow, who has a right of dower therein, he will not be entitled to a credit on his account equal to the value of her dower, as it will be presumed that the sale was made subject to dower.[44]

Combination of credits and charges. Where a claim not properly proved is paid by an administrator, but the amount is afterward repaid and accounted for by him, the item should not appear in his settlement as either a debit or a credit.[45] In a case where adult heirs and the widow and a third person to be appointed as guardian for a minor heir entered into an agreement under which they released their interest in certain property in favor of the widow and the minor heirs, and the widow was appointed administratrix, it was held that as against the adults the widow in her account should credit herself with the property delivered to the adults and should show that the property released by them was turned over to herself as widow and the minor heir, leaving the remaining property to be accounted for and distributed in accordance with the statute of distribution.[46]

Items charged by mistake. Where a representative through mistake has charged himself with money, claims, or property not constituting assets of the estate, he is entitled to a corresponding credit in his accounts;[47] and where he has been charged for an unauthorized expenditure, but the estate has received a benefit therefrom, he is entitled to a corresponding credit.[48]

Credits exceeding assets. The jurisdiction to settle an account of personal assets of an estate does not extend to the allowance to the administratrix of charges in her favor beyond the amount of such assets.[49]

in part and in part illegal, and there is no mode of discriminating as to what is legal, the entire credit should be rejected.[50]

Debts barred by limitations. Where the executor or administrator has power to waive the bar of the statute of limitations,[51] he is entitled to credit in his accounts for payment of a debt which was so barred,[52] but he can have no credit for such payment where he had not power to waive the bar.[53] It has been held, however, that, where the representative has paid a debt barred by the statute before decedent's death, the court will presume, after a lapse of more than twenty years, that the executor had evidence of a new promise by the debtor in his lifetime, and that credit should be allowed for the payment;[54] and in a case where it appeared in the settlement of an executor's account that a note executed by him and testator was barred by the statute of limitations, except for partial payments made thereon; that such payments were made by the executor with money furnished by testator for that purpose; that the note was given to aid the executor, who was testator's son, in purchasing a team; and that testator had designed paying the note himself, the executor was held entitled to credit for the amount paid to cancel the note.[55]

Interest. The representative may, according to some authorities, be credited with interest on proper disbursements where he has been charged with interest on money declared to be assets,[56] but the allowance of interest is not a necessary consequence of the entry of a credit at a particular date,[57] and interest should not be allowed on advances made to pay debts when there were sufficient assets to pay them.[58]

[§ 2394] F. Compensation—1. Right to Compensation—a. "It is an established rule that a trustee, executor, or administrator, shall have no allowance for his care and trouble, the reason of which seems to be, for that on these pretences, if allowed, the trust estate might be loaded, and rendered of little value. Besides, the great difficulty there might be in settling and adjusting the quantum of such allowance, especially as one man's time may be more valuable than that of another; and there can be no hardship in this respect upon any trustee, who may choose whether he will accept the trust, or not." benefit therefrom by virtue of the statute of distribution or the provisions of the will.[61]

The reason for allowing compensation to executors and administrators is to reward them not only for their time, labor, and trouble in administering the estates, but also for the responsibility incurred and for the fidelity with which they discharge the duties of their trusts.[62]

Death or revocation of authority. An executor or administrator who dies or whose authority is revoked is nevertheless entitled to compensation for the services actually performed by him.[63]

Trust company as administrator. Where a trust company, appointed as an administrator of an estate, has rendered the services, and the estate has received the benefit, it cannot be denied a reasonable compensation, the measure of which is that allowed by the statute to legally appointed executors and administrators.[64]

Public administrator. A public administrator is sometimes allowed, by statute, the same compensation as other administrators,[65] or double the commission to which an ordinary administrator would be entitled,[66] but such a provision is superseded, as to the county in question, by a statute fixing a salary for the public administrator, and providing that the same shall be in full compensation for all services performed by him.[67] A public administrator who, during the period between the election of his successor and the expiration of his own term of office, fails to procure a revocation of his letters, and fails to state his accounts to the close of his term, and to petition for relief from the further performance of his trust, but continues to administer upon the estates in his hands after the expiration of his term of office, cannot complain because his services are regarded as voluntary, and he is denied special compensation therefor.[68]

[§ 2395] b. What Law Governs. It is usually held that the compensation of a personal representative is governed by the law operative at the time of the rendition of his services and not by the law in force at the time of his appointment or the settlement of his accounts,[69] but there is also authority for the views that compensation is to be computed under the law in force at the time of the settlement of the representative's accounts[70] or the award of compensation;[71] that a statute allowing to executors and administrators a compensation for their services applies to all settlements made after its passage, although the services were performed before that time;[72] and that the power to grant an allowance for the expenses of administration is governed by the law in force when the application therefor is made.[73] If an administrator goes into a foreign state and there collects assets and voluntarily brings them into the state of his appointment and subjects them to the order of court in such state, his compensation must be regulated by the laws of such state.[74]

[§ 2396] c. Void or Irregular Appointment. It has been held that the validity of an administrator's appointment cannot be questioned on the accounting, and where he has rendered services as such he is entitled to his expense and commissions.[75] Accordingly compensation has been allowed to executors or administrators who acted under letters which were irregular or improperly issued, although not void,[76] and even to an executor who has acted under void letters testamentary.[77] But it has also been held that one is not entitled to compensation where he acts under void letters,[78] procures his appointment as public administrator knowing that he is not by law entitled to it,[79] or is displaced because allowed to qualify without giving the requisite security.[80] One who takes possession of the estate of a relative in time of war when there is no authority competent to grant letters of administration will not be considered as a trespasser but as a trustee acting for the best,[81] and will be allowed commissions on his accounts.[82] One who is entitled to administer, but never actually does so, may be entitled to commissions as against one who does administer, if such result is brought about by the improper conduct of the latter in obtaining a wrongful appointment and in failing to deliver the estate to the rightful administrator.[83] It is usually held that the fact that a will under which one is appointed and acts is afterward found invalid will not deprive him of compensation for services rendered in good faith,[84] and the same rule applies to an administrator whose letters are revoked by the admission of a will to probate.[85]

Where appointment as administrator is fraudulently obtained by means of false representations of relationship to decedent and consequent right to administer, compensation will be denied, even though the estate has not been injured.[86]

[§ 2397] d. Necessity for Judicial Allowance. Personal representatives have no right to appropriate assets of the estate for the payment of their commissions until an allowance thereof by the court;[87] but they are entitled to retain in their hands a sufficient fund to cover their lawful commissions to be awarded on the settlement of their accounts,[88] although a failure to retain funds for this purpose does not deprive the representative of the right to compensation.[89]

[§ 2398] e. Effect of Testamentary Provisions.[90] It has been held that a testator may deprive his executor of all compensation if he so expressly provides in his will,[91] and where the testator makes to his executor a bequest or devise in lieu of compensation for his services, no compensation other than such bequest can be allowed.[92] But testamentary provisions will not be construed as depriving the executor of the right to compensation if they may be construed otherwise with equal reason,[93] and the general rule is that before a bequest or devise can be held to be made in compensation for services to be rendered by executors, there must be language in the will from which such an intention can be inferred.[94]

[§ 2399] f. Priority of Claim. It has been held that the compensation of the executor or administrator should be allowed to him in preference to debts,[95] and legacies,[96] and even that such compensation is entitled to priority in payment over funeral expenses.[97] But the court is sometimes authorized by statute to direct payment of the expenses of the funeral and last illness of the decedent in priority to the compensation of the representative.[98]

[§ 2400] 2. For What Services Allowed.[99] Unless statutory fees are provided to compensate personal representatives for all services rendered, and other compensation forbidden except in cases especially provided,[1] the general rule is that personal representatives are entitled to reasonable compensation for all services which are necessary to a proper administration and settlement of the estate, or which benefit the estate,[2] but are not entitled to compensation for services which are not properly connected

[a] Caring for property of estate.—A personal representative is entitled to an allowance against the estate for his time and services in taking care of the property of the estate, so long as it remains under his management, and he is accountable for it in that capacity, although the use of the property was bequeathed to another, who during all the time had the income of it. Richardson v. True, 28 Vt. 676.

[b] Collection and investment of a fund pending litigation.—Where pending a suit against an administrator to recover specific funds, by consent of all parties the administrator collected and invested them, he was allowed his commission, it being held to be his duty to take care of the funds until the ownership was determined. Wells v. Robinson, 13 Cal. 133.

[c] Services by agent.—In no case will an executor be entitled to an allowance for services performed by an agent gratuitously. Chisholm v. Barnard, 10 Grant Ch. (U. C.) 479.

[d] Services performed by attorneys.—Where executors employ attorneys to make collections which they might conveniently make themselves, they ought not to be allowed commissions thereon in addition to those of the attorneys. Carter v. Cutting, 5 Munf. (19 Va.) 223.

[e] Services resulting in loss.—Although ordinarily the only services for which an administrator or executor will be allowed are such as are beneficial to the estate, an allowance may be made for services undertaken in good faith, although they are not of pecuniary or other benefit, but rather result in loss. In re Lichtenberg, 58 Wash. 585, 109 P 48.

with such settlement or for acts done for their own benefit.[3]

[§ 2401] 3. From What Fund Payable. The compensation of personal representatives is usually to be paid out of the general personal estate[4] of his decedent.[5] The residuary estate is the primary fund to be looked to for payment of the compensation of the representative,[6] and such compensation is not chargeable on legacies,[7] except by way of abatement when the general estate is insufficient to pay both the legacies and the representative's compensation.[8] Such compensation is not generally a charge on real estate,[9] but where the personal estate is exhausted or there was none in the first instance compensation for services rendered in selling land for the payment of debts and paying out the proceeds is a charge on such proceeds,[10] and it has also been held that compensation for managing and selling real estate devised to be sold for the benefit of testator's children must be paid out of the proceeds of the land[11] so as to leave the personalty for the payment of debts.[12] Where a representative, under the provisions of a will, acts in relation to a certain fund as a trustee rather than as a representative, his compensation for executing the trust is to be paid out of the income of such fund rather than out of the general estate,[13] and so where the income of a certain fund is given by will to a person for life or for a shorter period, commissions for collecting and paying the income must be paid out of the income and not out of the general estate or out of the principal of the fund.[14] Where, on the death of an administratrix, her accounts were settled by her executor, any commissions to which she was entitled should have been allowed to the accountant, and not as a claim against the administrator de bonis non.[15]

[§ 2402] 4. Commissions—a. In General. In a number of jurisdictions the statutes provide for compensation to executors and administrators in the form of commissions on the value of the assets received or administered by them.[16]

[§ 2403] b. On What Allowed—(1) In General. The commissions of an executor or administrator are regarded as his entire compensation, not only for collecting the assets of the estate, but also for the labor, risk, and trouble attending the entire administration and settlement, and it is therefore generally held that commissions should be allowed upon any and all property of the estate which comes into the possession of the representative and for which he accounts.[17] Commissions may be al-

[b] Excess over appraisement.—Commissions should be allowed on the excess of sales over the appraised value of the assets. Evans v. Iglehart, 6 Gill & J. (Md.) 171.

[c] When partnership interest a part of estate.—An executor's commission on the value of the succession's interest in a partnership should not be determined by an inventory made before the partnership affairs have been liquidated, but by the amount of productive property accruing therefrom to the succession after liquidation. Milmo's Succ., 47 La. Ann. 126, 16 S 772.

27. See infra § 2418.

28. Pinnell v. Scribner, 12 La. 608.

[a] Rents and revenues not included in inventory.—Commissions should be allowed on rents and revenues which have come into the hands of the personal representative in the course of administration, if not cov-than the value at the time of settlement, the latter value controls in fixing compensation,[29] but it has been held that in determining the value of property not sold to fix the administrator's commissions, the appraised value of land as contained in the original inventory and appraisement should be taken, and not the present value, where the administrator had received and accounted for the rents for twenty years.[30]

[§ 2405] (3) Legacies and Distributive Shares —(a) In General. As a general rule personal representatives are entitled to commissions for paying over legacies and distributive shares as well as for paying debts,[31] and commissions may properly be allowed on assets which the heirs desire to retain.[32] Where, however, parties entitled to the proceeds of an estate during a year are infants, and the personal representative has neither given them or their guardian a complete statement in writing, nor paid the money over to the guardian, but has only given information verbally and by informal memoranda as to the receipts for the year, he is not entitled to commissions on the shares of the infants.[33]

[§ 2406] (b) Specific Legacies. The personal representative is not entitled to a commission on a specific legacy,[34] even though such legacy consists of stocks, bonds, or other securities, which are usually regarded in the business world as practically the equivalent of money.[35]

[§ 2407] (c) Property Delivered in Kind. A commission may be allowed on the amount of a general legacy or distributive share, although it is paid by the delivery of property in kind instead of in money,[36] the commission being based on the market value of what was thus turned over.[37] This rule is ordinarily applied in the case of stocks, bonds, or other securities, the delivery of which is regarded as equivalent to a payment in money.[38] missions may be allowed an interest and income accruing to the estate.[39] Where a fund is given to a personal representative in trust and he is required to receive and disburse the income of the fund, he is usually held entitled to commissions upon such income,[40] although a contrary view has been expressed.[41] Executorial trustees, directed by the will to receive the rents and profits of real estate and apply them to the use and benefit of a person for life, who permit the beneficiary to occupy and use the devised premises, are entitled to commissions on the annual income thereof.[42] It has also been held that an administrator was properly allowed commissions on rents collected by him from land belonging to beneficiaries, and not acquired under the will involved, in carrying out testator's desire to provide for the education of the beneficiaries.[43] No commissions are to be allowed on income retained by the testamentary trustee as beneficiary.[44] An executor is not entitled to commissions on an enhanced value of stocks and other investments made with money on which commissions have been charged and allowed in a prior account.[45] An executor who is directed by his testator, while holding his estate in trust, to keep all moneys belonging thereto safely and profitably invested, is entitled to commissions on the real value of notes in which he finds the money already safely and profitably invested by the testator, and it is not necessary for him to convert such notes into money and reinvest them.[46]

[§ 2409] (5) Receipts and Disbursements—(a) In General. The commissions of executors and administrators are sometimes based on their receipts and disbursements;[47] and for this purpose receipts and disbursements are sometimes made separate items, a certain per cent being allowed for receiving and a certain per cent for disbursing assets.[48] The terms "receipts" and "disbursements," as here used, ordinarily refer to money actually received and paid out.[49] In some jurisdictions it seems commissions are allowable only on receipts and disbursements of money to the exclusion of other property;[50] but even where this is the rule commissions have been allowed upon bonds, notes, accounts, etc., which have been used in lieu of money, the principle being that that which was used as money should in equity and fairness be regarded and considered as money,[51] but the delivery of bonds by an executor under an order of court is not such a payment of money as to entitle him to commissions.[52] Where a creditor of the estate purchased property at a sale made by the executors and gave credit for the amount, it was held that the executors were entitled to commissions on the amount thus settled, although no money was paid.[53] In other jurisdictions commissions are not limited to money, but may be allowed upon any property having a money value.[54] Where disbursements are not allowed by the court, no commissions on such disbursements are allowed.[55]

[§ 2410] (b) Resulting from Continuance of Decedent's Business. Where a personal representative carries on the business of his decedent, he is not entitled to commissions on the gross receipts realized or the necessary disbursements made by him while conducting the business,[56] but the proper compensation is a reasonable allowance for the time and labor bestowed in carrying on the business.[57]

lar reasons it has been held that an administrator is not entitled to an allowance of commissions upon assets which he has charged to himself under protest.[60]

[§ 2412] (7) Indebtedness between Representative and Estate. While the general rule is that an executor or administrator is not entitled to a commission for the collection of a debt which he himself owes to the estate,[61] a contrary view has been asserted.[62] If, however, the representative has actually paid his debt to the estate, he may be allowed half commissions for handling and disbursing the amount.[63] It has been held that the representative is entitled to commissions on a debt due to himself from decedent, a claim for which is presented and allowed on his accounting,[64] but there is also authority for the contrary view.[65]

[§ 2413] (8) Real Property and Its Usufruct—(a) In General. Personal representatives are not generally allowed commissions upon real estate, or the proceeds thereof,[66] or upon rents or profits derived therefrom;[67] but in a few jurisdictions the rule is otherwise.[68] Where the will works an equitable conversation of realty into personalty, it is to be treated as personalty with respect to commissions,[69] and it has been held that, where real estate comes into the hands of executors as trustees, and is treated as personalty, and accepted by the persons entitled thereto as such, the executors are entitled to have it so considered in determining the amount of their commissions.[70]

personal representative who receives and accounts for the proceeds of realty sold under the direction of the will, or by a decree of court, is entitled to commissions thereon,[71] even though payment is affected otherwise than in money,[72] as for instance where the land is purchased by a creditor of the estate, and the debt and the purchase price are set off against each other.[73] But when land is sold or the proceeds thereof disbursed without the agency of the representative, he is not entitled to commissions.[74]

An actual sale is necessary in order to entitle the representative to commissions; the mere fact that he is empowered by the will to sell realty is not sufficient,[75] unless the will gives him the right to commissions without regard to actual conversion of the realty into personalty.[76] Nor does the rendition of valuable services with respect to real estate which is not sold create a right to commissions.[77] It has been held, however, that, where an executor who was directed by the will to sell real estate made repeated efforts to sell the same but such efforts were unsuccessful, and he died without having effected a sale, his personal representative could collect a commission for the services rendered;[78] and that, when a conversion of realty authorized by will is prevented by the beneficiary, by means of a bill brought to restrain the executor from converting the real estate, on the ground that there is no necessity for it and to compel him to convey it to the complainant, commissions will be allowed.[79]

Where there is an actual partition of the real estate among the persons entitled thereto, the executor does not become entitled to commissions on the value of the property merely because he joins in the deeds, either as a party in interest or because of a power of sale given to him by the will.[80]

[§ 2415] (c) Where Collection of Rents Authorized. Even where the rule generally prevailing is that an executor or administrator is not entitled to commission on the rents and profits of real estate,[81] commission on rents may be allowed in exceptional cases where such rents were lawfully collected by the representative.[82]

on real estate or the proceeds thereof, the value of all lawful encumbrances must be deducted, and the surplus only taken as a basis of computation,[83] although it has been held otherwise where all the proceeds were received and disbursed by the representative.[84] It has also been held that the reasonable value of decedent's mortgaged realty, which was charged to the administratrix as assets, and was taken, under foreclosure, into immediate possession of the mortgagee on a compromise, in consideration of a waiver of a deficiency judgment against the estate, is properly included in the value of property administered as a basis of computing commissions;[85] and a personal representative has been held entitled to commissions on the whole amount bid at a mortgage foreclosure sale of land of the estate, to pay a debt of the estate, although the money was not actually handed over to him.[86] It has been held that, where mortgaged realty is purchased by the mortgagee from an administrator of the deceased mortgagor, the administrator is not entitled to any fixed commission,[87] but should receive only what his services are actually worth.[88]

[§ 2417] (9) Property Not Assets of Estate. As a general rule a personal representative is not entitled to commissions on property not belonging to the estate, even though taken possession of or inventoried by him;[89] and where an executor is allowed commissions on an accounting for a bond which was in the hands of the testator as trustee, such commissions belong to the estate of the testator and not to the executor personally.[90] But when the representative is compelled by law to hold, protect, and guard funds coming into his hands which he has reason to believe to be assets of the estate until the right to such funds can be determined he is entitled to his commissions thereon;[91] and it has been considered that the representative was entitled to "some commissions" on property which came to his hands as belonging to the estate of his decedent, whether or not it rightfully belonged to the estate.[92]

[§ 2418] (10) Worthless or Uncollected Assets. An executor or administrator has no right to charge commissions on worthless or uncollected debts or assets,[93] unless perhaps where he has attempted in good faith to realize upon them.[94] Even if he is entitled to anything for his services as to uncollectable debts specific compensation and not commissions should be allowed.[95]

On debts due by distributees commissions should be allowed, although such debts are not actually paid to the representative, when they are included in the administration account and set off against the distributive shares of the debtors.[96]

[§ 2419] (11) Lost or Perished Assets. An executor or administrator has been held not entitled to commissions on property which has been lost or which has perished.[97]

[§ 2420] (12) Assets Not in Possession or Unadministered. On assets never in possession of the personal representative nor chargeable to him, and in no sense administered by him, a commission is not allowable.[98] Accordingly it is held that, where an executor or administrator does not receive any funds or other assets of the estate, he is not entitled to any compensation even though he may have been subjected to trouble in preparing for administration.[99] But it has been held that the representative is entitled to commissions on property of the estate actually brought into his possession and administered by him, although the will did not give him seizin of such property.[1]

[§ 2421] (13) Foreign Assets. It has been held that commissions are not allowable on money collected by the administrator in a foreign jurisdiction and paid to a creditor residing therein,[2] no administration having been granted in that jurisdiction.[3]

[§ 2422] 5. Amount of Compensation—a. In General. The amount of the compensation of executors and administrators is governed by statutes, some of which fix a definite amount, while others leave the matter to the discretion of the court, either entirely or within certain maximum and minimum limits.[4] Where the court has a discretion in the matter, it should award an amount which is reasonable under the circumstances of the case, in view of the time, trouble, risk, and responsibility demanded by the nature of the trust, the manner in which the estate is managed, and the faithfulness or the nature of the services rendered by the personal representative.[9] Although personal representatives are usually allowed commissions,[10] their compensation sometimes takes the form of an allowance of a gross sum for all services rendered,[11] or a per diem allowance for the time spent in performing the duties of administration.[12]

Where commissions are paid on part of an estate at an intermediate accounting, commissions can be allowed only on the amount which comes into the representative's hands afterward, and such commissions are calculated as if the subsequent receipts were part of the prior receipts.[13]

Annual rests. A personal representative cannot make annual rests in his account and be allowed full commissions thereon, unless he makes an annual accounting.[14]

Interest on commissions has been disallowed where the representative was in default,[15] and where the commission alone was ample compensation in consideration of the size of the estate.[16] It has also been held that an administrator is not entitled to recover interest on his claim for services during the pendency of an appeal in a suit to remove him and compel him to account.[17]

A court should not fix in advance the compensation of executors where it has the administration of the estate before it.[18]

A statute fixing the salary of the public administrator of a certain county controls as to his entire compensation and he is not entitled to compensation in accordance with the general statute fixing the compensation of executors and administrators.[19]

The executor of a deceased coexecutor, on the settlement of the accounts of a sole surviving executor, is not before the court in his official capacity; and any allowance to be made to him rests in the sound discretion of the surrogate, and is not measured by the statute relating to the compensation of executors.[20]

Where executors have received more than they were entitled to as commissions, interest on the excess to the date of the accounting should be deducted from the amount to which they are entitled.[21]

[§ 2423] b. Extra Allowance.[22] When the exact amount of compensation or the maximum amount allowable is fixed by statute, in the absence of a testamentary[23] or statutory provision for increased compensation for extraordinary services, personal representatives can be allowed only the fixed com-formed, increased compensation may be allowed according to some cases,[44] which are, however, opposed by other cases asserting a contrary view.[45] Where an executor accepts the office with knowledge of a provision in the will fixing his compensation, he is ordinarily entitled only to the amount fixed by the will.[46]

Executors' compensation provided by the will is not a legacy and does not abate with the legacies on insufficiency of the estate to satisfy the legacies, where it does not appear that the stipulated compensation is unreasonable or unearned, and the services were fully and faithfully performed.[47]

Where an executor dies pending the administration, he is not, it has been held, entitled to the compensation fixed by the will or a pro rata share there-

[b] Construction of provisions.— (1) A provision of a will that the executors should be paid for their services one half the fees allowed by law in such cases contemplated the fixed fees allowed by law to guardians of estates, and the compensation was to be determined by Sayles Civ. St. Annot. (1897) art 2780, fixing such fees at five per cent on all sums that the guardian actually received or paid away in cash. Thomas v. Matthews, 51 Tex. Civ. A. 304, 112 SW 120. (2) Where a will directed that executors should take charge of the residue of testator's estate, invest a portion of it in bank stock, and loan out the balance, collect all the accounts, and manage the estate, and during that time make certain payments to the widow and children, and also provided that the executors should file a complete inventory, and should make annual accounting to the probate court, it was held that testator did not intend that his executors should act in the double capacity of executors and trustees, and, where they acted as executors merely in carrying out the provisions of the will, they were not entitled to compensation for services as trustees in addition to their regular compensation as executors. Judson v. Bennett, 233 Mo. 607, 136 SW 681.

[c] "Handsomely paid."—Where a testator directs that his executor shall be "handsomely paid" for his services, only the ordinary commission will be allowed him unless there has been extraordinary trouble. Waddy v. Hawkins, 4 Leigh (31 Va.) 458. To similar effect Kenan v. Graham, 135 Ala. 585, 33 S 699 (testamentary provision that executor be paid "liberally").

[d] "Usual commission."—A provision in a will that an executor shall receive the "usual commission" has been held to mean that he shall receive (1) a five per cent commission on the personalty (In re Lilly, 181 Pa. 478, 37 A 557), and (2) a two and one-half per cent commission on sales of real estate (Wedekind's Est., 11 Phila. (Pa.) 68).

[e] Allowance for professional services.—By his will the testator declared that any executor or trustee for the time being of his will engaged in any profession or business should be entitled to charge and be paid all usual professional or other charges for any business done by him in the premises, whether in the ordinary course of his profession or business or not. The testator had a large and valuable collection of works of art, and in the sale of this collection defendant, who was one of the executors and was a well-known art expert and keeper of mediæval antiquities at the British Museum, priced the various articles and gave valuable advice as to their sale. It was held that defendant was carrying on a profession or business within the meaning of the clause of the will, and was entitled to be paid a commission of 10s per cent on the sale price. Re Wertheimer, 106 L. T. Rep. N. S. 590.

[f] Periodical payments. — The will may provide for payment of portions of the compensation at stated intervals. In re Ringot, 124 Cal. 45, 56 P 781.

[g] Making up deficiency.—Where a will provides that out of the income generally of the estate the executor shall receive compensation at the rate of so much a year in lieu of commissions, if the income is less in one year and greater in another, the deficiency of compensation in one year may be made up by the excess in other years, especially where there are no provisions of the will that will fail in the event that the executor receives all the compensation that was intended for him, although there may be less of income to be distributed. The rule might be different if the will limited the payment of the executor's annual compensation to the annual income of the estate. Marfield v. McMurdy, 25 App. (D. C.) 342.

[h] Continuance of compensation beyond period of administration.— Where a will provides that the executor shall receive in lieu of commissions a given sum annually during the time he acts as such, and it is evident from the whole scheme of the will that the testator contemplated that the executorship should last for several years, certainly until the death or remarriage of the testator's widow, the right of the executor to receive such annual compensation will continue beyond the period of administration. Marfield v. McMurdy, 25 App. (D. C.) 342.

[i] In Maryland (1) it was formerly held that a testator cannot, by anything put in his will, in any wise affect the commissions which the law allows to his executor. Handy v. Collins, 60 Md. 229, 45 AmR 725; State v. Baker, 8 Md. 44; McKim v. Duncan, 4 Gill 72. (2) But later, it was provided by statute that if anything be bequeathed to an executor by way of compensation, no allowance of commissions shall be made unless the said compensation shall appear to the court to be insufficient; and if so it shall be reckoned in the commission to be allowed by the court. of, but his compensation should be measured by the rule of quantum meruit to be gauged by the compensation allowed by law.[48]

An administrator with the will annexed is entitled to reasonable compensation for his services, regardless of any declaration made by the testator in his will fixing compensation for administering the estate.[49]

Renunciation of testamentary provision. The statutes sometimes give an executor the right to renounce a testamentary provision as to compensation and to take the statutory compensation.[50]

[§ 2425] d. Effect of Agreement. The compensation of an executor or administrator may be fixed by an agreement between him and persons beneficially interested in the estate,[51] or even by an agreement made with the testator in his lifetime.[52] Pursuant to such agreement the representative may be bound to accept a compensation less than he would be entitled to under the statute,[53] or even to serve without any compensation whatever.[54] Some authorities hold that an agreement with the testator[55] or with those beneficially interested in the estate[56] may entitle the representative to greater compensation than is allowed by the statute; but other authorities hold that an agreement for more than the statutory rate of compensation for performing the ordinary duties of administration cannot be enforced,[57] although an agreement for additional compensation for services outside of his official duties is valid and enforceable.[58] The burden of establishing an agreement as to compensation is of course upon the party who asserts it.[59]

[§ 2426] 6. Temporary or Special Administrators. Temporary or special administration is a recognized trust, and entitles the administrator to reasonable compensation,[60] the amount whereof is held to rest in the discretion of the court,[61] which may adopt, as a proper standard for fixing the allowance, the rate of compensation allowed by statute to a regular administrator.[62] It has been held that a special administrator should be allowed a commission only upon moneys actually paid out, and in addition to this a reasonable compensation for services rendered the estate, and he is not entitled to commissions on money and property delivered to his successor in office,[63] but other courts have declined to adopt this view,[64] considering that the commissions of a temporary administrator should be based upon the value of the whole estate received and passed over by him.[65] A temporary administrator is not entitled to commissions on such money and securities of the estate in his hands as had been in the possession of his predecessor, and as to which the estate of the predecessor had been awarded commissions.[66]

[§ 2427] 7. Coexecutors and Coadministrators. Where there are two or more executors or administrators of an estate, they are usually entitled only to the recompense or commissions payable to a single representative,[67] in which all share,[68] although a different rule is sometimes established by statute allowing full commissions to each representative, not exceeding a certain number, where the estate exceeds a certain amount.[69] The waiver of commissions by one personal representative does not prejudice the rights of his corepresentative,[70] and it has been held that, where one of two executors is not entitled to commissions, the other executor is entitled to only one half of the regular commissions.[71]

no compensation.[73] However, where a gross sum is allowed by the court it must, unless the representatives agree otherwise, be equally divided, and one cannot retain the whole sum on the ground that the other rendered no services.[74] It has been held that, where both representatives had been equally willing and ready to do whatever was required in administering the estate, the commissions should be equally divided between them,[75] even though one has actually done all the work,[76] but other courts have declined to accede to this view.[77]

Effect of agreement between representatives. The portion which the several representatives are to receive may be and sometimes is settled by an agreement entered into by them,[78] but questions as to the existence of such a contract and the rights of the parties under it cannot be determined on final settlement of the accounts of the representatives.[79]

Where the compensation of executors is fixed by the will, and one of the executors dies after qualification, his estate is entitled to the compensation fixed.[80]

Effect of failure to qualify. Where only one of two executors named in a will qualifies, he is entitled to the entire commissions.[81]

[§ 2428] 8. Successive Administrations. Where an estate is administered by successive personal representatives, the compensation allowed should be apportioned among them according to the services rendered,[82] and the compensation of one will not be increased because his predecessors received no compensation for their services.[83]

Where the compensation is measured by commissions [84] on the amount or value of the estate administered, the usual practice is to allow to each representative commissions on that part of the estate administered by him,[85] or on his receipts and disbursements.[86] A second administrator is not entitled to commissions on assets on which a commission has been paid to a former administrator,[87] unless the statute contemplates the allowance of several commissions on the same assets,[88] and the fact that there are successive administrations should not increase the rate of commissions on any part of the assets;[89] but it has been held that the allowance for compensation made to a special administrator has no effect upon the commissions of the general executor or administrator of the same estate, these being distinct and independent allowances for different services.[90] The right of the last personal representative to his commissions, whether they are large or small, is a direct liability from the estate to himself, and he is entitled to payment from the estate, and cannot be remitted for payment to a settlement between himself and a prior representative who had appropriated to himself for commissions the whole amount allowed for the commissions of a full administration.[91] Where the probate of a will revoked an administrator's letters, there was not a mere succession of the administrator by an executor so as to deprive the administrator of commissions.[92]

Representatives of a deceased executor or administrator are not entitled, in their own right, to any compensation out of the estate of the original decedent for their services in settling accounts of their own decedent[93] or paying out assets received by their decedent.[94] Where an executor dies without having collected any assets, commissions cannot be recovered, on behalf of his estate, by his personal representative.[95] An executor of an executor is entitled to commissions on pecuniary legacies paid out under the will of the first testator, commissions to be retained out of the fund due to the legatees;[96] but he is not entitled to commissions from the estate of his immediate testator, on the hypothesis that the amount was due as a debt from his estate to the former estate, unless it appears that the last testator claimed the fund adversely to the legatees under the first will.[97]

pensation as executors for services which could be rendered by them only as trustees.[1]

Acting or holding in one capacity only. Where by will one is appointed both executor and trustee, but holds the estate as executor until it is finally settled, never having qualified as trustee, he is entitled to compensation for his services as executor.[2] Where a will contemplates that the income of the residuary estate shall be received by the trustees directly and never be held by them as executors, they are not entitled, when accounting as executors, to double commissions on unexpended income in their hands.[3] Where one who is named executor and trustee declined to act as executor, although he qualified as such, but did serve as trustee, he is entitled to commission as trustee, but not as executor.[4]

Self-imposed trusteeship. An executor who is not appointed trustee by the will cannot perform self-imposed duties as such and receive compensation therefor.[5]

Acting as executor and guardian. Where a person is trustee by reason of his being executor, and voluntarily assumes control of a fund willed to minor children, he not being their guardian, he is not entitled to commissions as guardian;[6] but where an administrator having the funds of an infant in his hands is appointed his guardian he has the right as administrator to charge commissions for transferring the funds to himself as guardian, and as guardian the right to charge for receiving it.[7]

Executor under one will and trustee under another. One acting as trustee under one will and executor under another, although dealing with the same funds, may receive commissions for services in each capacity.[8]

[§ 2430] 10. Waiver or Renunciation of Compensation. An executor or administrator may waive or renounce his claim to compensation for performance of the duties of his trust,[9] and a promise or agreement made by him that he will not charge for his services may be regarded as equivalent to a renunciation of his claim.[10]

Implied waiver. The waiver or renunciation of any claim for compensation need not be expressed but may be implied from the acts and conduct of the personal representative,[11] provided of course

[a] Test for determining right.—Double commissions to the same persons, first in the character of executors and then in that of trustees, are to be awarded only when the will contemplates a several and separate action in each capacity, not at the same but different stages of the administration, and that they are not to be allowed where the will makes no such separation, but blends the two duties and commingles them without a severance. To the ordinary duties of an executor may be added the performance of a trust in such a manner that the two functions run on together. It is the duty of an executor, as such, to pay to a legatee the amount of the legacy in the manner and at the time provided by the testator, and it does not change that duty that the payment of the principal is postponed and the income made payable annually in the meantime. A trust duty may thus be imposed upon an executor which thereby becomes and is made a function of his office. A will must go further than that to admit of double commissions, and must clearly and definitely indicate an intention of the testator to end the executor's duty at some point of time, and require him thereupon to constitute and set up one or more several trusts, to be held and managed as such for the interest of the beneficiary. Matter of McAlpine, 126 N. Y. 285, 27 NE 475.

[c] The mere mental determination of an executor to appropriate property in his hands as such to himself as trustee under the will is not such a setting apart as to entitle him to any separate compensation for his services as trustee. Miller v. Congdon, 14 Gray (Mass.) 114.

[a] A promise to some beneficiaries is sufficient, although it was not made to all. Bate v. Bate, 11 Bush (Ky.) 639.

[b] Representation amounting to promise.—Where a stranger to an estate obtained the consent of the distributees to his appointment as administrator upon his professions of friendship for them, and his statement that "it would not be a nickel in his pocket," thereby giving them to understand that his services would be gratuitous, he should not be allowed any commissions, but only his expenses as administrator. Hilton v. Hilton, 109 SW 905, 33 KyL 276.

11. Matter of Tucker, 29 Misc.

the acts are such as to indicate clearly a purpose on the part of the representative not to claim compensation;[12] but a mere intention to waive such a claim at the time of performing services is not alone sufficient to deprive the representative of his right,[13] nor is a statement of the representative, made long after qualifying that he did not intend to claim any compensation, sufficient to defeat his rights, where there was no agreement at the outset that he would serve gratuitously.[14]

Consideration. A promise to forego commissions must be supported by a consideration in order to be binding,[15] although if it is carried into effect by actual payment to the promisees, without deduction, the transaction becomes a gift which, except as against creditors, needs no consideration.[16] It has been held that allowing one to be appointed administrator, or foregoing the right to oppose his appointment, is a sufficient consideration for his promise to serve without compensation,[17] but it has also been considered that an agreement to administer the estate for a certain amount, if no objection to the promisor's appointment as administrator was made, was void as against public policy, because involving trafficing in the office of administrator.[18]

Proof of waiver. It is, however, incumbent upon those who oppose an allowance of compensation to show that there was an actual waiver or renunciation.[19]

Effect of waiver. A waiver or renunciation precludes of course any subsequent assertion of a claim for compensation,[20] and is binding not only upon the representative himself but also upon his assignees and representatives.[21]

Coexecutor not bound. The refusal of an executor to charge any commissions cannot prejudice the rights of his coexecutor in that respect.[22]

Withdrawal of waiver. A waiver of commissions in a petition for letters of administration does not deprive the representative of the right to commissions where the waiver was without objection and by leave of court withdrawn before appointment.[23]

[§ 2431] 11. Forfeiture or Deprivation of Compensation—a. In General. While there are a few cases holding that statutes providing for the allowance of commissions to personal representatives are imperative and that the courts are without discretion to withhold them,[24] the generally accepted view is that the allowance of compensation to an executor or administrator may be refused where a proper ground for such action exists.[25] As a general rule, however, compensation should be allowed unless there has been some act or omission calling for punishment,[26] and a representative who has acted in good faith should not be deprived of compensation because of mistakes or irregularities in his proceedings,[27] although it has been held proper to refuse to allow any compensation where no services were performed,[28] unless the failure was due to the act of the beneficiaries in preventing the performance of his duties by the representatives.[29] Where the assets of an estate have been exhausted in payment the expenses of litigation instituted by those interested therein, an administrator cannot recover compensation for his services, although his efforts to perform his duty were honest and intelligent, and although he was subjected to much annoyance and trouble from such litigation.[30]

[§ 2432] b. Mismanagement. The general rule is that an executor or administrator who has been guilty of fraud, willful default, or other misconduct, or of gross negligence in the management of the estate, by reason of which the estate has suffered detriment, may be deprived of compensation,[31] although there is also authority for the view that the representative is not to be deprived of compensation by reason of any fault, mismanagement, or neglect, or any loss resulting therefrom, but that he

[a] Inaccurate accounts. — An executor who discharges his duty honestly but, owing to want of business training, keeps his accounts loosely and inaccurately, is entitled to compensation for his care, pains, and trouble, but the amount of compensation should not in such a case be relatively large. Hoover v. Wilson, 24 Ont. A. 424. Compare Kee v. Kee, 2 Gratt. (43 Va.) 116 (where the usual commission was allowed, although accounts had not been properly kept).

[b] Failure to deposit or account for funds.—Failure to comply with a statute providing a penalty for not depositing or accounting for funds will not deprive a personal representative of his commissions, as such a statute is highly penal, and the penalty provided therein cannot be increased. Baum's Succ., 9 La. Ann. 412; Cresswell's Succ., 8 La. Ann. 122.

[c] An executor who is compelled to make good an amount embezzled by his coexecutor is entitled to commissions. Matter of Dougherty, 43 Misc. 468, 89 NYS 549, 4 Mills Surr. 272.

[e] The representative is entitled to offset commissions against the amount for which his default has rendered him liable, and hence a decree providing that commissions shall not be computed until the default is made good is improper. Matter of McDowell, 184 App. Div. 646, 172 NYS 658.

[f] Partial commissions may be allowed when the court deems it proper to show disapprobation of the executor's conduct by a deprivation of all commissions would impose too heavy a penalty. Jacobus v. Munn, 38 N. J. Eq. 622 [rev 37 N. J. Eq. 48].

(2) Where the representative, through mistake, and without fraudulent intent, claimed a credit to which he was not entitled. In re Hoffer, 156 Pa. 473, 27 A 11.

[b] The failure of an executor to procure a judicial construction of the will, and his refusal to pay anything to the beneficiaries thereunder, based on a plausible, although erroneous, view of the will, do not warrant the withholding of commissions earned. Matter of Ingersoll, 95 App. Div. 211, 88 NYS 698 [mod 41 Misc. 600, 85 NYS 293].

should be charged with the losses and allowed his commissions.[32] Whether or not the misconduct is such as to warrant the refusal of compensation in any particular case is a matter resting within the discretion of the court,[33] and it has been considered that compensation should be withheld only where the misconduct was willful and exceptional,[34] or where there was gross negligence[35] or fraud.[36] In the case of active misconduct, the act alone has been regarded as sufficient to warrant a withholding of compensation, regardless of its effects,[37] but in the case of mere neglect or default, the generally accepted view is that this should result in a deprivation of compensation only where there has been a resulting loss to the estate,[38] although there are also to be found cases in which gross neglect has of itself been regarded as sufficient to warrant a withholding of compensation regardless of any resulting detriment to the estate.[39] In so far as the services of the executor or administrator have been beneficial to the estate, he may be allowed compensation therefor, although in other respects he has been unfaithful to his trust.[40]

[b] Manner of account.—Commissions will not be disallowed because the manner in which the account was made out might be construed as showing a purpose of getting commissions to which the representative was not entitled, there being no misconduct of improper management of the estate. Matter of Dutcher, 102 App. Div. 410, 92 NYS 418.

[d] Taking commission on settlement of claim.—The conduct of an administrator settling a claim of an alleged illegitimate son of decedent at the instance of the heirs of full age to avoid scandal, who secretly took a twenty-five per cent commission on the amount paid from claimant, and charged the heirs for the full amount, while not commendable, was not such misconduct as to justify a refusal of any compensation for his services as administrator. In re Wilson, 86 Nebr. 175, 125 NW 158.

[e] Investments.—(1) An administrator is entitled to no commissions when he has neglected to invest funds remaining in his hands, or has converted them to his own use. In all cases such neglect to invest funds is treated as a breach of trust, and commisions are disallowed. McKnight v. Walsh, 24 N. J. Eq. 498 [aff 23 N. J. Eq. 136]; Frey v. Demarest, 17 N. J. Eq. 71. But see Edmonds v. Crenshaw, 5 S. C. Eq. 224 (executors allowed commissions notwithstanding gross failure to discharge duties imposed by will, where they were charged in their account with the amount to which the estate would have amounted if such duties had been properly performed). misapplication or commingling of funds of the estate, compensation has been allowed in cases when no fraud or bad faith on the part of the personal representative was shown,[43] or it appeared that on the whole the estate derived benefit from his services.[44] It has also been held proper to refuse commissions on funds which have been commingled but to allow compensation for services as to other property.[45]

[§ 2434] d. Failure to File Inventory or Accounts. Compensation is sometimes refused to personal representatives who fail to file their inventories or accounts as required by law,[46] but this is a matter resting largely in the discretion of the court,[47] and commissions are frequently allowed notwithstanding such a default where the representative has acted in good faith and no loss or injury to the estate has resulted.[48] A representative may be allowed a commission on money paid over under a decree in a suit against him for an accounting, although his failure to make a return deprived him of the right to commissions for managing the estate.[49]

[§ 2435] e. Resignation or Removal. While personal representatives who resign or are removed before the estate is fully administered are not entitled to full compensation,[50] they should be allowed a sum commensurate with the services which they have performed, if beneficial to the estate,[51] and full commissions have been allowed where the estate was fully administered before the revocation of letters.[52] Where, however, a representative was allowed to qualify without giving bond and was afterward removed for failure to give the bond, he was held entitled to no commissions.[53]

[§ 2436] 12. Jurisdiction, Proceedings, and Review—a. Jurisdiction—(1) In General. As a general rule questions as to the allowance of compensation are within the jurisdiction of probate courts, or courts having probate functions.[54] It has been held, however, that an appellate court may allow compensation in a case where none was claimed or allowed below,[55] or fix the amount of compensation where the question of compensation was not before the court below for decision on the merits, and all the parties and evidence are before the appellate court.[56] It has also been held that where a court of equity is in possession of a suit for settling the administration of an estate, it may fix the compensation,[57] and one court has gone so far as to say that an allowance of commissions to an administrator may be made at any time by any court before which his accounts are drawn in question.[58]

Executing trusts as to realty. Allowing compensation to an executor for executing limited and contingent trusts as to realty is not a matter within the jurisdiction of the probate court.[59]

[§ 2437] (2) Apportionment of Commissions. It is usually considered that probate courts have jurisdiction to apportion compensation among corepresentatives,[60] although it has been held that the court has no power to determine the relative value of services as between the representatives and divide the commissions accordingly,[61] but should make a single allowance for the entire administration leaving the representatives to make a division among themselves.[62] Probate courts have no jurisdiction, after allowing compensation to corepresentatives in a gross sum, to compel one who has possessed himself of the whole amount to pay the others their shares.[63] According to some of the decisions, the remedy of one personal representative against another for his share of compensation is by action in the common-law courts;[64] but there also is authority to the effect that equity has jurisdiction in such a case.[65]

[§ 2438] b. Time for Allowance. Sometimes an allowance of compensation is not made until final settlement of the representative's accounts, at which time his total compensation is fixed;[66] but it is quite usual to make, at the time when intermediate accounts are settled, an allowance for such part of the compensation, or such commissions, as may then fairly be regarded as earned,[67] although full compensation for the entire administration cannot be awarded until final settlement.[68] Even on the final accounting the representative will not be allowed his commissions in full, if the final distribution of the estate is not to be made until a considerable time after such settlement; in that event the court will reserve, until the distribution is made, so much of the commissions as are allowable therefor.[69] The subject of commissions is closed by the settlement of the administration account, so that personal representatives cannot claim commissions on charges there made, or on interest charged at the settlement of the distribution account on the balance of the administration account.[70] A probate court cannot, several months after the final settlement of an estate, without opening such settlement after due notice to the parties interested, make an allowance in favor of the personal representative for his services in administering the estate.[71] The commissions are to be deducted as of the date of the settlement of an account and not as of the date of the filing thereof.[72]

[§ 2439] c. Proceedings for Allowance. No compensation will be awarded until an account is presented for settlement and an allowance asked,[73] and in order to warrant an extra allowance a claim therefor must be made.[74] According to some authorities, a personal representative should not claim a gross sum for his services, but should specify the items for which he claims compensation,[75] but it has also been held proper for the representative to claim a gross sum,[76] based upon a percentage of the assets,[77] or upon the time devoted to the business of administration.[78] It is for the personal representative to show compliance with a statutory provision upon which the allowance of compensation depends;[79] and when extra compensation is asked it is for him to show that he has rendered unusual services meriting such compensation.[80]

Notice to persons beneficially interested in the estate is sometimes regarded as a prerequisite to the allowance of compensation to the representative.[81]

In an action by legatees to recover their share of an indebtedness from the executor to the estate of the testator, the right of the executor to commissions on such indebtedness may, it has been held, be determined.[82]

sons interested in an award have a right within a reasonable time after the account of the personal representative has been passed to appear in the probate court and make their objections to the allowance of compensation,[83] and indeed it has been held that an auditing judge may properly call the attention of interested persons to unauthorized claims for compensation.[84] An allowance to an administrator on an annual settlement of credits for commissions is not a final adjudication as to the right to such credits, and such an allowance is carried over and can be excepted to on final settlement.[85] A person who has consented to the allowance made to a personal representative cannot thereafter object that the compensation was excessive.[86] An attaching creditor of a legatee cannot complain of the allowance of extra compensation, unless it appears that he is entitled to have the fund subjected to the payment of his claim.[87] Persons beneficially interested in the estate cannot object to an award to one of two executors of the entire compensation allowed.[88] Where an order of reference to take and state the account of an administrator does not embrace the question of the administrator's compensation, an exception to the allowance of compensation in the master's report is well taken.[89] Objections to the allowance of any compensation, based upon alleged mismanagement of the estate, should state specifically the acts of mismanagement which are relied on.[90] Under a prayer for general relief in an opposition to a personal representative's account and upon proof received without objection, the court may reject a claim for compensation, although the opposition itself does not present such an issue.[91]

[§ 2441] e. Hearing and Determination. Where persons beneficially interested in the estate oppose the representative's claim for compensation, it is the duty of the court to hear evidence on behalf of the opponents designed to defeat or reduce such allowance.[92] In passing upon the right of an administrator to extra compensation the court should possess itself of all the information available as to the manner of his administration.[93] The court may, notwithstanding the testimony of the representative, find that he has performed no services entitling him to more than statutory fees,[94] and it has been held that a representative should not be allowed a credit for extraordinary services where the only evidence to support such credit is his own testimony.[95] In determining the compensation of a special administrator, appointed to defend a will and protect contingent interests thereunder, the court should accord great weight to the opinions of eminent members of the bar.[96] Where executors claimed credit for commissions on their account, but withdrew their claim at the audit, reserving their rights for a future accounting, whereupon the auditing judge added the amounts of the commissions to the balance, there was no adjudication upon the question of commissions.[97]

Court or jury. Whether or not an executor or administrator is entitled to an extra allowance is a question for the court and not for the jury,[98] although it has been held that, where under the evidence it cannot be declared as matter of law that the executor was or was not entitled to extra compensation, it is proper to submit to the jury an exception of fact to the auditor's allowance of extra compensation, after such exception has been approved by the judge.[99] Even though the statute permits an action by administrators for extra compensation, and makes the verdict of the jury and the judgment therein conclusive, where the parties waive trial by jury and submit the question to the court it may pass upon the question of extra compensation.[1]

[§ 2442] f. Order or Decree of Allowance. It is proper to allow a lump sum as the compensation of an executor or administrator,[2] without particularly specifying the item for which the allowance is made.[3] Where a percentage allowance to an administrator is a reasonable compensation for the services performed and shown to the court, the form of the allowance does not render it improper, although there is no law authorizing an administrator to charge a percentage.[4] An order directing that there be paid to the executor for his services as such a certain sum which the court finds to be a reasonable and proper executor's fee for his services to the estate is not personal against the heirs of the deceased, but is in due form.[5] A decree allowing compensation in excess of that to which the representatives are entitled is binding on the beneficiaries who expressly consent to the account and acquiesce in the decree.[6]

Construction. Where one was named executor and trustee under a will and the estate of testator came to him under the will and his duties as executor were inconsiderable as compared with his duties as trustee, in determining the amount of his compensation, the principal fund should be deemed as having passed to him at once as trustee and an allowance on the corpus should be held to have been an allowance to him as trustee, although the accounts were filed as executor.[7]

Effect. The mere fact that one auditing judge may have mistakenly allowed an executor commissions in one account will not prevent another auditing judge, on the adjudication of a later account, involving a different fund, from refusing commissions to the executor.[8]

Conclusiveness. Where the statute provides that errors in settlements in the probate court may be corrected at any time by equitable proceedings, an order fixing compensation and attorney's fees obtained by an administrator on ex parte application only three days before filing his final account and after having given notice of his intention to do so is not conclusive on final accounting.[9] The ex parte allowance by the clerk of commissions to an administrator is not conclusive.[10]

[§ 2443] g. Review. While the right to appeal from orders or decrees of probate courts as to compensation depends largely upon constitutional or statutory provisions,[11] the action of the court in allowing or refusing compensation is usually subject to appeal,[12] and may of course be corrected if erroneous,[13] although where there is sufficient evidence to sustain the finding as to the compensation of executors, the action of the court below will not be reversed in the absence of manifest error.[14] But only persons having an interest, which is injuriously affected by the order allowing compensation, can appeal therefrom,[15] and an objection as to the allowance of compensation cannot ordinarily be taken for the first time in an appellate court.[16] An appeal will usually lie from an order fixing the amount of compensation,[17] but when the amount of compensation is left to the discretion of the court[18] its award will not be interfered with, unless it appears that there has been a manifest abuse of such discretion.[19] A finding of the lower court as to the value of assets for the purpose of estimating commissions will not be disturbed when there is evidence to support such valuation.[20] The action of the court in the allowance of compensation will not be reviewed, where the facts on which it acted do not appear in the record;[21] and where the evidence as to an alleged agreement by the administrator to serve without compensation was oral and conflicting, the trial court's decision on the issue was accepted as conclusive.[22] Reversible error cannot be predicated on an adjudication merely that the representative's claim for commissions was premature, leaving the question as to the right to compensation open until a future settlement.[23] The decree of the lower court may be affirmed notwithstanding error in respect to allowing[24] or refusing to allow[25] compensation, where under the circumstances of the case the error is harmless. It has been held that on appeal in proceedings for final settlement of an administrator's accounts, where there were heirs of age and also minor heirs, an administrator could not be compelled to remit from his judgment for compensation a commission received from a claimant for effecting settlement of the claim, taken out of money furnished by the heirs of age, since, if a remittitur were ordered, the minor heirs who contributed nothing to the fund for satisfaction of the claim would receive money to which they were not entitled, at the expense of the adult heirs, and the remedy of the heirs contributing could be asserted only in an independent action.[26] Where, on appeal from an ex parte order of the orphans' court allowing compensation to a special administrator, and from its refusal to suspend the effect of such order, it was determined that parties objecting to the compensation as excessive were entitled to be heard thereon, the appeal from the refusal to suspend was dismissed, and the cause remanded, without affirming or reversing the order for compensation.[27]

[§ 2444] h. Costs.[28] The costs of a proceeding pertaining to the allowance of commissions and attorneys' fees to an administrator to collect may be ordered paid from the estate.[29]

[§ 2445] G. Stating and Settling Accounts—1. Form and Requisites—a. In General. No special form is generally required for the account of a personal representative,[30] but such an account should present briefly a clear and definite statement of the conduct of the administration,[31] and it has been held to be sufficient if the account, together with the inventory, shows the condition of the estate.[32] The account should ordinarily be stated in the form of debts and credits,[33] and the receipts and disbursements should be itemized,[34] although items of ex-

[a] "The correct form is to charge the accountant with the amount of the inventory and appraisement of personal property, and all moneys received since filing the same, from debts due decedent, not inventoried, together with any excess over the appraised value realized by a sale of the personal property, or any portion thereof, and any proper surcharges either admitted or duly proved. Credit is then to be allowed for preferred debts, expenses of administration, allowance to the widow or children, if claimed, loss upon appraisement by sale, and debts of decedent if undisputed and estate solvent. The true balance for distribution will thus appear." Squire's Est., 11 Phila. (Pa.) 110, 111.

[b] Where notes and accounts are contained in the inventory of the estate, the settlement with the administrator should show distinctly which of them have been collected; and, as to those which have not been collected, the causes of the failure to collect them should be satisfactorily explained. Steele v. Morrison, 4 Dana (Ky.) 617.

[c] Sales of realty.—It seems that, where by will a personal representative is given full authority to dispose of the real estate without further proceedings in court relating thereto, either asking for sale or confirmation of the same, it is proper to require the personal representative in making his account to set out with reasonable fulness all such sales, giving the date of the sale, the location of the land, the amount sold, and the name of the purchaser. When, however, the personal representative must secure the order of the court for the sale of his decedent's estate and report and have confirmed the sale of the same, all matters being matters of record and accessible at all times, the account need not be so specific. In re Williamson, 7 OhS&CP 24, 4 OhNP 282.

[d] A list of all the unpaid claims against the estate and of the names and residences of persons interested in the estate may be required of a personal representative on filing his account, under the Pennsylvania act of 1832. Fettig's Est., 5 Kulp (Pa.) 152.

[e] Description of claims and creditors.—An account should declare the nature of the claims of the creditors, and their names and residences should be mentioned. Gautier's Succ., 8 La. Ann. 451.

[f] Annual stops and rests.—Where the court, in stating an administrator's account, made annual stops and rests, crediting the administrator with the current expenses of administration, and charging him with interest at eight per cent on the balance until settlement, and in the calculations deducted from the share of each distributee the allowances and advancements made by the administrator to each distributee during the particular year, charging the administrator with interest on the balance from the rests so made, the distributees were not prejudiced by such method of stating the account. Howard v. Rutherford, 149 Ala. 661, 43 S 30.

[g] Full disclosure.—A direction of the court that the representative make full disclosure of the condition of the estate, specifically with reference to securities mentioned in the inventory, was not complied with by an account which merely stated that debt to bank had been paid, and "said collaterals returned to the executrix." In re Dolenty, 53 Mont. 33, 161 P 524.

[h] Where a trust was created for the benefit of testator's son and the son's family, and the trust fund was charged with such advances by the testator to his son as the executors should in their discretion determine, and such debts of the son at the testator's death as the executors should elect to pay, the executors should exercise their discretion as to these matters before their final accounting as executors and before the trust fund was constituted, and should be required on their final accounting, where the existence of any debts of the son is denied, to state what debts existed as to which the executors claimed authority to exercise their discretion. [a] Scaling.—During the period of paper money, all sums of debt and credit in an administration account ought to be stated in due order of time, and to stand as nominally entered, without scaling, when the executor is debtor; but, when there is an excess, it should be scaled. penditure may be expressed in general terms.[35] Where a claim has been allowed by the representative, he should so report in his next periodical account or in his final account if no previous account has been made.[36] In stating an account the income or interest should be separated from the principal,[37] and items relating to real estate should be stated separately from those relating to personal property.[38]

Statutory requirements. Of course, however, if there are statutory requirements as to the account they must be complied with.[39] It is sometimes required by statute that allowance claimed for services, etc., shall be specifically stated.[40]

Concerning property in another state. The account of a domiciliary personal representative as to property in another state, where he has taken out ancillary letters of administration, should be rendered by obtaining a certified copy of the account rendered in the other state, with a certificate of the proper court that the same has been examined, allowed, and confirmed, and that the original account and necessary vouchers are on file.[41]

Same items in two accounts. An item may properly be charged to either of two accounts where the representative could lawfully determine in the first instance to make the expenditure out of either of the accounts.[42]

Expenses of administration and the representative's compensation need not be included in the account, as they are claims which are to be ascertained and adjusted by the court.[43]

Partnership affairs between an executor and another, both distributees of the estate, should be settled between them personally, and not through the executor's account.[44]

The balance for distribution should be shown, and not left to be ascertained by calculation.[45]

An intermediate account should state whether an inventory has been filed,[46] and if none has been filed the account should furnish the information usually supplied by the inventory.[47] Such account should also state the facts as to advertisement for, presentation, payment, or rejection of claims,[48] the names and ages of legatees or distributees,[49] and the names and residences of guardians if any,[50] and should be accompanied by vouchers.[51] As the purpose of such an account is to inform the court and persons interested as to the receipts, disbursements, and changes in property, if any, the administrator need not charge himself therein with the appraised value of the entire estate.[52] Where an administrator filed an account styled a "final account," showing a balance in his hands applicable to unpaid audited claims, but it did not state what the indebtedness of the estate amounted to, or the names of the creditors, their residence, etc., or ask that the administrator be discharged, and the court allowed the same in the form prescribed by statute for the allowance of an annual exhibit, and did not audit and settle the same as the statute requires in the case of a final account, such account should not be treated as a final account.[53]

Knowledge as to statements. A statement by an executor in his account as of his own knowledge, of a matter which he does not know to be true, is fraudulent in law.[54]

Amendments and corrections. When an account as presented is not sufficiently specific, or is otherwise defective, it may be amended by order of court[55] and mistakes in accounts may be corrected on their settlement.[56] The court cannot command the conscience of the personal representative, so as to compel him to conform his returns under oath to the views of the court;[57] it is for the representative to make returns;[58] the court judges their effect.[59] The court has no authority to make alterations in the account of an administrator by striking out items on both sides of the account and interlining others, but still preserving in the aspect of the account such an appearance as would indicate that the administrator had sworn to the account as altered, when as a matter of fact he had not; but the court should proceed to state the account de novo.[60]

[§ 2446] b. Blending or Separating Accounts. The administration account and the distribution account should be kept separately and not blended or mingled,[61] and it has been held that the court should, of its own motion, refuse to confirm an administration account containing items of distribution;[62] but it has also been held that on an accounting by an executor who is also a legatee the court should state the entire account, both as executor and as legatee, charging against the legacy all money received, less disbursements and commissions.[63] Blending into one account the transactions of an accountant as administrator with the will annexed and as trustee under appointment by the court is irregular, tends to confusion, and will not be allowed;[64] but the circumstances may be such as to render it unnecessary that accountants should state their accounts as executors in advance of or as formally separate from their accounts as trustees under the will.[65] Neither should the account of an administrator de bonis non with the will annexed be blended with the account of the first executor.[66] Where a will creates several distinct trusts in the executors, a separate account should be rendered as to each of such trusts.[67] In a suit by wards and distributees against their father's executors and their guardian for an account, there should be a separate account taken with each distributee and ward.[68] Separate estates cannot be blended by the consent of persons interested therein and only one account rendered and one settlement effected.[69] An account cannot be rejected merely because it mingles statements as to the proceeds of real property with statements as to personal property;[70] but where sureties on an administration bond are not responsible for the proceeds of realty,[71] separate accounts of personalty and of the proceeds of realty should be rendered, when on a settlement the liability of such sureties is to be determined.[72]

[§ 2447] c. Verification. The accounts of an executor or administrator should be duly verified by his oath;[73] but it has been held that the omission of a formal affidavit is immaterial if the personal representative attends in person and is examined under oath as to his account.[74] Where there are several personal representatives, the affidavit of one of them to the truth of the account is sufficient.[75]

Rabasse's Succ., 50 La. Ann. 746, 23 S 910. To same effect Moise's Succ., 107 La. 717, 31 S 990.
[c] Subsequently discovered errors.—If the account of an executor or administrator, under a citation from a surrogate, is produced properly authenticated, the adverse party should be called upon by the surrogate to state his objections, if any; but such objections do not absolutely conclude the party from further objecting, if, in the course of the investigation, errors in the account are discovered, which the party objecting had no means of knowing at the time when he was called upon to object to the account. Gardner v.

judicating upon an account, the report of the representative and the exceptions thereto stand as the pleadings of the parties [77] and limit the issues to be tried.[78] It is usually held, however, that whether or not exceptions are filed, the court should carefully examine every account presented for settlement and be satisfied that it is in every respect practically correct before entering an order settling it,[79] although it has also been asserted that unchallenged items on the credit side of an executor's final account cannot be rejected;[80] that a surcharge of an executor for an overpayment of counsel fees cannot be made by the court without an exception to his account taken by a party in interest before the court;[81] and that under a statute authorizing the filing of objections to the final account of an executor, "specifying the particulars of such objections," etc., the court on hearing objections to the final account of an executor is limited to the particular specifications set forth in the objections.[82]

[§ 2449] b. Persons Entitled to Object. Any person interested in the disposition of the property of a decedent embraced in an administration account may object or file exceptions to its allowance.[83] An executor or administrator may contest the account of his corepresentative,[84] or of his predecessor;[85] and the guardian of a person interested in the estate may object on behalf of his ward.[86]

Legatees and distributees come within the scope of the rule;[87] and where persons averring that they are beneficially interested in the estate file objections to the account, such objections should be disposed of in a legal manner, and not summarily dismissed on the assumption without proof that the objectors are not heirs or distributees.[88] A person to whom the heirs have made conveyances purporting to transfer the legal title to all the property which decedent owned has a sufficient interest to question the accounts of the representative.[89]

A creditor may be a person interested, and so entitled to contest such an account,[90] and it has been held that the mere allegation that one is a creditor entitles him to be heard,[91] although there is also authority for the view that some proof of the status of the objector as a creditor is necessary.[92]

A person who has no interest in the estate is not entitled to object or except to the account of the personal representative,[93] and the same is true of one who claims as his own, and adversely to the estate, property which is also claimed to belong to the estate.[94] A creditor of a distributee has not such an interest in the estate as authorizes him to contest the account of the representative.[95]

[§ 2450] c. Time for Making and Filing.[96] The law usually designates a period within which opposition must be made, particularly in excepting to an allowance, and one who objects or excepts should comply with such a requirement.[97] It has been held, however, that the fact that exceptions to an executor's report are filed one day too late does not prejudice any substantial right of the executor, and is not sufficient ground for the striking of such exceptions,[98] and that it is within the discretion of the court to permit the filing of exceptions to an executor's report raising a question passed upon in overruling former exceptions, where the exceptions last filed are filed before the final approval of the report, and bring to the attention of the court provisions of the will not previously noticed.[99]

Opening default. One cited as legatee to appear at the accounting of an executor, but who did not appear because she did not then know of her interest as heir, may have her default opened and be allowed to file objections on account of her rights as heir.[1]

Filing nunc pro tunc. Where an account of an administrator was absolutely confirmed under the rule, and before the end of the term parties in interest applied for leave to file exceptions nunc pro tunc, showing that they were nonresidents and without actual knowledge of the proceedings, and alleging that the administrator had appropriated all the personal estate and had secured a decree in his favor for an amount chargeable on the real estate in payment of an alleged claim which was unfounded, it was held that permission to file exceptions should be granted.[2]

Laches. Where exceptions to the final report of an administrator were filed and heard within a month after presentation of such report, the heirs were not chargeable with laches because they had, five years previously, served notice on the administrator not to make payments involved in the exception.[3]

[§ 2451] d. Grounds. An objection or exception may be directed to any matter as to which the account is incorrect or improper.[4] An objection may be directed to credits claimed,[5] such as disbursements,[6] or may be urged against the representative's claim for compensation.[7] But persons excepting to a final account of executors cannot complain that vouchers showing payments to other persons interested were not filed.[8] Charges against the representative may also be the subject of objection[9] based upon a contention that certain charges not in the account should be added thereto,[10] or that charges in the account should be increased,[11] as when it is claimed that the assets of the estate are greater than the account shows.[12] Where a trustee dies, and there is found in the possession of his surety securities slightly exceeding the trust estate, and his administrator files an account charging himself with all such securities, exceptions filed by the substituted trustee to the account must be considered to determine whether or not the securities are proper investments to be taken over by the new trustee.[13] An objection on a subject not touched upon by the report may be disregarded where the estate remains open,[14] and it has been held that the court cannot entertain an objection to the final settlement on an administration which involves his acts as executor of another person, based on his failure to account for such acts.[15] Exceptions based on the representative's neglect to account for rents are properly stricken out where the court has no jurisdiction to compel him to account therefor.[16] An objection by a creditor that the amount paid him is less than his claim cannot be urged as an objection to the account.[17] It is immaterial that executors charged themselves with stock at less than its true value, where they were in a position to distribute the stock in kind and most of the legatees consented to such distribution.[18]

Technical objections to an account are not favored[19] and some injury resulting from the technical defect complained of must be shown before they will be permitted.[20]

An objection which presents a question of law which can be determined only when the issues of fact have been decided is improper as such a question should be presented to the court when a decree upon the account is submitted.[21]

An exception directed to a clerical error of the auditing judge, which may be readily corrected by him, is needless and will not be allowed.[22]

Exceptions to a supplemental account of an executor must be confined to matters contained in that account.[23]

[§ 2452] e. Form and Sufficiency. Exceptions must be taken in the manner provided by statute,[24] and it is sometimes required that the exceptions be filed in writing.[25] When a person interested in a decedent's estate is not satisfied with the account of the personal representative, he must point out to the court clearly and specifically the ground of his objections,[26] and state specifically the item or items to which he objects.[27] It has been said that opposi-

[b] Surcharging or falsifying.—(1) It is a well settled rule in equity that one who objects to a stated account must surcharge or falsify, that is, must allege an omission in the account or deny the correctness of some or of all the items rendered. An account rendered by a personal representative is a stated account within the meaning of this rule. Tate v. Gairdner, 119 Ga. 133, 46 SE 73. tions to an executor's account are in the nature of answers, and matters alleged therein are open to every objection of law and fact as if such objections had been specially pleaded.[28] Whether or not exceptions filed are sufficiently specific must be determined from the circumstances of the case.[29]

[§ 2453] f. Additional or Further Exceptions. If the objections filed are insufficient the surrogate may allow further objections to be filed,[30] but this is not within the power of an auditor.[31] Legatees objecting to the final account of the executor are not limited to their original objections, but they may file additional objections to modify their demand to correspond with the testimony;[32] and an opponent to an account homologated so far as not opposed retains a right to amend his pleadings and claim a larger amount than first claimed, provided it does not change the nature of the demand.[33] Objections repeated after they have been overruled are properly stricken out.[34]

[§ 2454] g. Effect of Filing Exceptions. Exceptions which have been filed and are not withdrawn remain before the court for consideration until the account is finally passed on.[35]

[§ 2455] h. Wheaton v. Pope, 91 Minn. 299, 97 NW 1046. (2) Where testator, who had always credited his sons with a percentage of the profits of his business, died leaving a will making two of the sons, his executors, the widow of one of the sons who died prior to final settlement is estopped to except to the allowance of such profits to the executors, where she was given the share to which her husband would have been entitled, but her minor children who received nothing are not so estopped. Meyer v. Meyer, 106 Miss. 638, 64 S 420. (3) Where executors paid a corporation for collecting rents which they should have collected themselves under the will, and an officer of the corporation, who received the greater part of the payment, filed objections as heirs and asked that the executors are charged with such payment the court should refuse to surcharge the account unless sum received is paid back. Parker v. Leighton, 131 Md. 407, 102 A 552.

[b] Withdrawal of objections. — Where on the hearing on a reference in proceedings for the settlement of the account of a temporary administrator the objections were confined to a single point, and all the others were expressly withdrawn, on a second hearing before the same referee had pursuant to an order to take further evidence on the single point, the other objections to the account were withdrawn. Matter of Grant, 132 App. Div. 739, 116 NYS 767, 1152.

[c] Circumstances not amounting to estoppel.—(1) Where the administrator of an estate sells a crop of cotton belonging to the estate on credit, and takes from the purchaser, who afterward becomes insolvent, a note without sureties, and the husband of one of the distributees actually assists in making the sale, but it is not shown that he knew of or approved the taking of the notes, without sureties, she will not be estopped from objecting to the note as a credit to the administrator in final settlement. Walls v. Grigsby, 42 Ala. 473. (2) A legatee is not estopped to contest a charge which is made against him by advice of his attorney, who without his knowledge is also attorney for the personal representative. In re Cummings, 120 Iowa 421, 94 NW 1117. (3) The failure of a creditor of a decedent to object to certain acts of the administrator, it not appearing that he knew his rights, or that his failure to object influenced the administrator's conduct, creates no estoppel in the creditor to object to the accounts of the administrator. Crum v. Meeks, 128 Ind. 360, 27 NE 722. (4) The fact that testator's widow talked with the executor about the advisability of making certain repairs on property of the estate does not preclude her from questioning the validity of expenditures for such repairs, if they were in fact unlawful. Matter of Tisdale, 110 App. Div. 857, 97 NYS 494. (5) A legatee is not estopped from claiming interest by the fact that she had previously applied to court for an order compelling executor to pay an amount due, and her acceptance of the amount awarded, she not being compelled to combine two claims. In re Lackie, (Iowa) 171 NW 679.

[d] A previous objection made on accounting by executors that they could not account in the surrogate's court for the proceeds of realty does not estop the objecting parties to afterward claim that such proceeds were personalty, and to demand an accounting. Bolton v. Myers, 83 Hun 259, 31 NYS 588 [aff 146 N. Y. 257, 40 NE 737].

[e] Failure to object to item when first reported.—The fact that on the filing by an administrator of his first report no objection is made on a particular item, although other items are objected to, does not waive the right of the party who has so objected, subsequently to object to such item on the filing by the administrator of a supplemental report. 37. Williams v. Rhodes, 81 Ill. 571.

the account as it then stands and if he fails to object to an item he waives his objection to it.[38]

[§ 2456] i. Exceptions to Partial Accounts. It has been held that on the settlement of a final account the court cannot hear exceptions to an intermediate account previously filed, but such exceptions should be made the subject of a separate application to open the intermediate account or for a restatement thereof.[39] But it has also been considered that any account filed by a personal representative is open to be excepted to at the final settlement, and it is not necessary that exceptions should be taken previously, although it may sometimes be expedient to file exceptions to the different accounts as they are from time to time settled,[40] and exceptions, although not groundless, may be overruled where in the judgment of the court they would be more properly exhibited against the final than against a mere partial account.[41] When persons prefer exceptions to a partial account and withdraw them before its confirmation, they have no right to prefer the same exceptions to a subsequent account, but such withdrawal will not prevent other persons from making the same exception.[42]

[§ 2457] 3. Hearing and Reference—a. In General. With respect to the settlement of the account of an executor or administrator there should be a hearing,[43] of which proper notice should be given to the persons interested.[44] The proceedings on the filing of exceptions to an administration account are in the nature of a suit[45] in equity.[46] Whenever applicable the rules of procedure in civil cases should be applied,[47] but in most matters arising in such a proceeding strict formality is not required.[48] The personal representative stands as plaintiff and the objector as defendant in such proceedings,[49] and the former has the right to open and conclude.[50] Evidence may be taken either orally[51] or by deposition,[52] although it has been considered that, where nice questions both of law and of fact are involved, the trial thereof on affidavits, instead of oral testimony, should be discouraged.[53] Where, on an executor's accounting involving its validity of an antenuptial agreement, the surrogate, after the evidence had been closed and briefs submitted, stated orally that he would find the agreement invalid for want of consideration, it was error for him to refuse to receive evidence of a pecuniary consideration therefor.[54] Such proceedings may be continued for proper cause[55] or stayed pending the determination of an independent suit over matters arising in connection therewith.[56] In proceedings on the settlement of estates such entries should be made as to show at whose instance settlements are ordered, what representatives appear before the court, and who claim under the estate and are actors in the cause.[57]

[§ 2458] b. Submission of Issues to Jury. It has been considered that issues of fact arising in an accounting proceeding in a probate court should be determined by the court and not submitted to a jury,[58] although there is also authority for the contrary view.[59] It is certainly true that there may be cases in which it is very desirable to submit an issue arising on a settlement of an account to a jury, and in such cases the court may doubtless frame an issue for the jury,[60] whose verdict is, however, only advisory to the court.[61] Conversely, where the allowance or disallowance of an item is a matter for the discretion of the court, the subject is not a proper one for submission to a jury.[62]

Issue of law. The question whether an amount paid by an administrator out of assets in his hands should be placed to his credit is one of law and not of fact, and should not be submitted to a jury.[63]

[§ 2459] c. Matters to Be Determined.[64] The matters proper for determination on an accounting by a personal representative are the correctness of his account,[65] and the jurisdiction extends to all questions necessarily involved.[66] It is proper to determine such matters as the amount of assets with which the representative should be charged,[67] the justness and legality of credits claimed against the estate arising from the payment of debts of the decedent, funeral expenses, statutory allowances, and the expenses of administration,[68] whether the personal representative has managed the affairs of the estate with good faith and ordinary prudence,[69] and whether certain expenditures should be charged to principal or income.[70] The court may also make an allowance of interest in favor of a legatee and against an executor.[71] In a proceeding for final settlement of an administrator's account, the surrogate cannot voice, alter, or change the plain terms of an order of the supreme court making advances to putative heirs of a lunatic, either directly or through the indirect process of interputation.[72]

To avoid multiplicity of suits. Where, on final accounting, the sole heir claimed to share in the administrator's commissions, it was held that the court might, to avoid multiplicity of suits, dispose of that contention without leaving the heir to action over against the administrator.[73]

Matters not to be determined. Irregularities which have not been prejudicial to the estate should not be inquired into,[74] nor should the validity of the appointment of the personal representative be determined.[75] Neither can the right of a public administrator to take charge of an estate be raised under exceptions which go only to the proper settlement of his administration.[76] In settling an administration account the payment of legacies or the distribution of the surplus should not be included.[77] Issues cannot be raised with parties as to matters not brought into court through the presentation of the account,[78] nor should questions as to matters which are entirely collateral be determined.[79] One who claims property as belonging to himself and not to the estate administered will not be permitted to assert such claim by way of opposition to the account.[80] An objection to the account of an executor who is also trustee that the decree should provide for the quarterly payment to the objector of the interest payable to him under the will is more properly a matter for disposition upon the settlement of the decree.[81] When a claim has been adjudicated against an administrator it is so far binding upon the heirs that they cannot have the allowance set aside as against claimant by exceptions to the administrator's account.[82] Where the property of an estate was transferred to a corporation to continue the testator's business, it was held that the probate court had no jurisdiction in auditing the executor's accounts to distribute the corporation's profits, or to allow the executor compensation for services as manager of the corporation.[83]

Corporate stock partly owned by estate. On exceptions to the account of executors relating to the distribution of stock in a corporation, the probate court has jurisdiction only over the shares owned by the estate, and not over shares in the same corporation owned by decedent's children individually.[84]

Fraud in allowance of claim. It has been held that the allowance of a claim of a personal representative against the estate of his decedent, procured by fraud, cannot be set aside upon exception to his account,[85] but it has also been considered that an issue of fraud and collusion in the establishment of a claim of another person against the estate, by reason of which it is claimed that the representative is liable for the amount, may be determined on the accounting.[86]

Rents and profits. The right to land or to the rents or profits thereof must be settled by a direct action at law and not in a collateral manner by objecting to an administration account.[87] Where an accounting executor and trustee had no power under the will to collect the rents of testator's realty accruing after death of the cestui, his account in that respect could not be settled in probate proceeding.[88]

The rights of legatees or distributees should not be determined upon the accounting,[89] unless the statute authorizes such procedure.[90] A distributee cannot, by objecting to a final settlement, raise and litigate the question whether a personal representative is indebted to the estate, since the latter is entitled to a jury trial on that issue.[91]

Right to contest. It is usually considered that if the interest of a person contesting a settlement is disputed that question may be determined on the settlement,[92] although it has also been held that whether a person claiming to have an interest in the estate is entitled to a standing in court is a question which should be determined on the hearing for distribution rather than on the settlement of the executor's account.[93]

On annual, partial, or preliminary accounting. When proceedings are instituted and conducted for an annual or partial settlement, the court of probate cannot of its own motion convert it into a final settlement and render a final decree.[94] In a proceeding for the settlement of the preliminary accounts of an executor, questions as to the final distribution of the estate or of the method of procuring repayment of advances made by testator cannot be determined.[95]

In Louisiana an opposition and not a separate action is the proper proceeding by an heir making a claim against the succession,[96] or by a creditor who demands to be placed on the tableau,[97] or for ascertaining the extent of the personal liability of a representative for acts of maladministration.[98] The question of the widow's right to the marital fourth may be raised and passed on in her opposition to the account when there are no heirs in Louisiana or claiming an interest and when the universal legatee is present and the account exhibits the proposed settlement of the succession.[99] A direct action should be brought to determine whether a legacy is illegal;[1] or to enforce a claim against the administrator of a succession for property belonging to another succession of which he is alleged to be in possession,[2] or an unliquidated claim for property not included in the inventory against a succession under administration.[3] The liability of a widow, as an intermeddler, for her husband's debts cannot be enforced by opposition to her tableau of distribution as his administratrix.[4] Where a rule filed in a probate proceeding is dismissed, and no appeal taken by the mover, the issues raised by the rule cannot be considered and adjudicated on the trial of an opposition to the administrator's account filed before the order of dismissal, although such opposition recites the filing of the rule and the issues therein raised as a reason for the rejection of the account.[5]

[§ 2460] d. Reference[6]—(1) In General. In a proper case, upon the settlement of the account of a personal representative, a reference may be ordered by the probate court to a referee, auditor, commissioner, or master,[7] who may be directed to state an account.[8]

Amending order of reference. Where the court decided to refer all questions arising on an executor's account for hearing and determination, and all parties proceeded as if such reference had been made, although in fact the order as entered merely directs the referee to hear and report the evidence, the court may, on receiving the referee's report, amend the order of reference nunc pro tunc.[9]

A reference to arbitration of matters of controversy arising on the settlement of the estate of a decedent is sometimes provided for by statute.[10]

[§ 2461] (2) Eligibility for Appointment as Referees, Auditors, or Commissioners. Where the duty devolves on the county court to revise and approve or reject the report of commissioners of accounts, it is not strictly proper to appoint members of such court as commissioners,[11] although it cannot be said to be irregular and inadmissible to make such appointments, where the law imposes no restrictions in the matter of selection of commissioners and there is always a sufficient number of justices to form a court for a revision of the report without those who act as commissioners.[12] A referee will not be removed on motion of the personal representative in the absence of any showing of bias against him or his attorney.[13]

[§ 2462] (3) Qualification of Referees, Auditors, or Commissioners. It has been held not necessary that the auditor or referee should take any oath unless this is required by statute.[14]

[§ 2463] (4) Powers of Referee, Auditor, or Commissioner. A referee before whom a proceeding to settle an account is pending may allow an amended account to be filed at the hearing.[15] When this is deemed necessary for the promotion of justice the auditor has the right to retain all vouchers submitted to him until the filing of his report.[16]

tration settlement for the correction of frauds the courts should find and designate the points in which the fraud may consist and confine the reference to those points.[18] Disputed questions of fact should not be referred to the auditor when this can be avoided, but he should be confined as nearly as possible to a mere statement of account.[19] A referee on an accounting by an administratrix has no power to pass on the question of allowances, costs, and taxable disbursements.[20]

[§ 2465] (6) Report. It is the duty of the referee or auditor to make a report to the court,[21] within the time fixed by statute or rule of court,[22] and he cannot withhold such report until his fees are paid.[23] It has been held to be the duty of commissioners to report the vouchers, the written evidence, and the substance of the parol proof on which they acted,[24] but it has also been held that when an order of reference does not require evidence to be reported, an exception on the ground of the failure of the referee to report evidence is not available.[25] Only questions within the jurisdiction of the court can be passed on by an auditor,[26] and the auditor cannot report on matters as to which no evidence has been submitted.[27] Where some of the items of an account are disputed or objected to as improper, and it is doubtful whether they should be allowed or not, it is not improper for the commissioner before whom the settlement is had to direct the attention of the court to them by alternate statements leading to different results, and thus leave the court to draw its own conclusions as to which statement should be confirmed.[28] A finding, by a committee to whom the accounts of an administrator were referred, that the charges made by the administrator for his services were reasonable, is sufficient, in the absence of a showing that it committed an error of law in so finding.[29] After a referee has filed his report he cannot make an additional finding.[30]

Where an account has been referred to the clerk of the probate court, it is no ground of exception that the court made a final decree without a report from the clerk.[31]

[§ 2466] (7) Exceptions to Report. The report of a referee may be excepted to by any party to the accounting proceedings;[32] and it has been held that an administrator, who has waived his exceptions to the commissioner's report under the erroneous impression that the report would be sustained, and the case then finally disposed of, may withdraw his waiver and renew his exceptions.[33] Exceptions ought to be at least specific enough to point out the error complained of.[34] An exception for lack of proper parties goes to the petition for an accounting and cannot be directed to the report of the commissioner.[35] Before passing upon the report in gross the court should consider in detail the exceptions taken thereto;[36] but exceptions should be dismissed, where the error complained of is not an error of the auditor but an error of the court, which can only be corrected on appeal.[37]

New or additional exceptions. It has been held that the court may allow the filing of further objections if the objections filed are insufficient,[38] but it has also been asserted that it is not error to refuse to allow a party to file new exceptions to the report, after the time for filing exceptions has expired, when no reason or excuse for not filing such exceptions within the time prescribed by law is offered.[39]

Effect of failure to except. Where an administrator takes no exception to a report finding a balance but declining to approve or disapprove the account, and acquiesces by moving for a judgment, the court will not be held to have lacked authority to render a judgment refusing to approve the accounts.[40]

[§ 2467] (8) Action of Court on Report. A referee or auditor does not decide as a court, but is employed simply to aid the court making the reference, and is subject to its directions; his determination is subject to approval or disapproval of the court and his report amounts to nothing until confirmed by it,[41] although it has been held that where an auditor appointed by the orphans' court to audit an executor's account, by agreement of the parties in interest, audited accounts of moneys received and paid out by the executor as agent for the collection of rents accruing after the testator's death, the orphans' court was without jurisdiction to revise the findings of the auditor as to moneys thus received as agent.[42] The court may adopt [43] or modify [44] the report, recommit it to the referee,[45] or set it aside.[46] In passing on exceptions to the report, the court exercises a jurisdiction in the nature of that possessed by a court of review or appeal, and is not called on to make any additional or independent findings on its disposition of the questions or issues referred or embraced in the report, whatever such disposition may be.[47] It may, however, if it so desires, take further testimony, and make findings of its own on which to base its orders.[48] It has been held that where no exceptions have been taken and filed the court has no alternative but to confirm the report,[49] and the report of a referee has the force and effect of the verdict of a jury, and must be allowed to stand, unless without support from the evidence,[50] or unless some plain and obvious error sufficient to warrant the setting aside of the report is made to appear by the party who objects thereto.[51]

An order that the report of a commissioner be recorded has been regarded as a confirmation thereof.[52]

Effect of confirmation. Where the court approves or confirms the report, it becomes conclusive as to all matters embraced therein,[53] and such approval and confirmation may cure whatever irregularity there may have been in the auditor's passing upon matters not within the submission to him.[54]

[§ 2468] (9) Rehearing or Second Reference. In a proper case the report may be recommitted to the referee, auditor, or commissioners for a further hearing or additional findings,[55] or for the purpose of having omissions in the original report supplied.[56] Such recommitment is, however, largely discretionary with the court,[57] and it has been considered proper to refuse to send the matter back for the purpose of allowing the representative to make further proof as to a point as to which he had ample opportunity to offer proof,[58] or where no error is apparent and no after-discovered evidence is averred.[59] A rehearing before another referee may be ordered in a proper case.[60] On a rehearing of an executor's account by an auditing judge, it is irregular to introduce new matter not comprised within the purpose of the rehearing,[61] especially where such new matter is contrary to the findings of the court.[62]

[§ 2469] 4. Evidence—a. Presumptions. In proceedings for stating and settling the accounts of personal representatives proper presumptions will be indulged.[63] Thus it will be presumed that some assets were received by the personal representative,[64] that amounts due to the estate could have been collected by the representative,[65] that notes taken by the representative on sales made by him were paid at maturity,[66] that a debt returned in the inventory without comment has been collected in full,[67] that a stock certificate standing in decedent's name and produced by his wife as his administratrix came into her hands after decedent's death,[68] that a debt of decedent was paid with money belonging to his estate,[69] that the personal representative of two estates, one of which was indebted to the other, paid the debt as soon as he had sufficient funds on hand,[70] that articles specifically bequeathed have been disposed of conformably to the will,[71] and that the receipt of a residuary legatee to the personal representative in full of the interest which he took under the will covered his share of uncollected assets.[72] Where the representative's general management of the estate evinces fidelity and prudence, a presumption arises in favor of the correctness of his account;[73] but where he has failed to keep accounts or take vouchers, or otherwise shows carelessness in his general management, obscurity and doubt as to whether a credit should be given in his favor will be resolved against him,[74] and where his accounts are not only untrustworthy, but of a most suspicious character, all presumptions are against him.[75] Where it is shown that the representative has converted a certain sum, there is no presumption that he has not converted other sums.[76]

[§ 2470] b. Burden of Proof—(1) In General. When a personal representative renders his account and it is contested, the burden is generally on him to sustain and establish its correctness,[77] and even though there is no formal opposition, the representative must show that his account is correct,[78] although he is not in such case obliged to prove each separate item.[79] An executor relying on consent of the beneficiaries to the use of funds of the estate in his own business must show that he acted in good faith and obtained such consent on full and fair representations and disclosures.[80]

[a] The representative must show: (1) The propriety of credits claimed. Shuey v. Lambert, 53 Ind. A. 567, 102 NE 150. (2) Actual payment of a claim alleged to have been paid. In re Frey, 73 N. J. Eq. 346, 67 A 192. (3) The validity of his individual claim against the estate. Matter of Arkenburgh, 58 App. Div. 583, 69 NYS 125. (4) The exact amount of taxes paid by him. Cox v. Doty, 45 SW 1044, 20 KyL 287. (5) The disposition of moneys shown to have come into his possession. Wilbanks v. Crosno, 112 Ill. A. 503. (6) Payment of his own admitted debt to the estate. In re Mall, 80 Nebr. 233, 114 NW 156. (7) The adequacy of the

On contestant. Where exceptions to an account are of an affirmative nature, the burden of sustaining such exceptions rests upon the contestant;[81] and it is also incumbent upon the contestant to show that he has an interest in the estate entitling him to oppose the accounting.[82]

[§ 2471] (2) As to Assets. The burden of showing that there were more assets than are acknowledged by the inventory or account rests on the party objecting,[83] who must sustain his contention with reasonable certainty and not leave the matter to mere conjecture or suspicion;[84] and the same is true where the objection is based on a claim that property of the estate was of greater value than is shown by the inventory or appraisement.[85]

On representative. When, however, assets are shown or admitted, the burden is upon the personal representative to account for their proper disposition;[86] and where the representative has failed to collect a claim due to the estate, the burden rests upon him to show that it could not have been collected by the use of due diligence.[87] So also, where certain property has been included in the inventory, but the representative claims an allowance therefor on the ground that it should not have been included in the inventory, the burden rests upon him to show that such property was not, in fact, a part of the estate.[88]

[§ 2472] (3) As to Disbursements. When a credit is claimed by a personal representative and its validity is disputed, the law casts on him the burden of supporting it;[89] and in order to sustain such credit he must prove not only the payment but security taken by him for money of the estate which he loaned. In re Roach, 50 Or. 179, 92 P 118.

[b] Inability to pay debt to estate.—An administrator is charged with his own personal obligations to the estate as a cash asset in hand, and he and his surety can be relieved only by showing that, at the time of his appointment, the administrator was hopelessly insolvent, and so remained up to and including the time of his final settlement. Moseley v. Johnson, 144 N. C. 257, 56 SE 922.

[c] A general denial, in the opposition of an account of an executor or administrator, puts in issue each and every item of the account, and puts upon the representative the onus of proving each item. Dougart's Succ., 30 La. Ann. 268.

also the correctness of the demand.[90] So with respect to the expenses of administration, the burden rests upon the representative to show that the expenses incurred were necessary and proper, and that the payments made were fair and reasonable.[91]

On contestant. But where a credit has been allowed on an annual or partial settlement, it is presumed to be correct, and the burden of overcoming this presumption rests upon the contestants;[92] and where a payment made by the representative is apparently a proper one and a contestant makes exceptions of an affirmative nature to such payments, the burden rests upon the contestant to show the impropriety thereof.[93]

[§ 2473] c. Admissibility. The general rules of evidence[94] are ordinarily applied in determining whether the evidence offered in accounting proceedings is admissible,[95] although there is also authority for the view that strict rules of evidence should not be allowed to govern in such proceedings.[96] Reference is made in the notes to numerous cases in which the courts have passed upon the admissibility of evidence adduced, and held, either that it was competent in its nature and possessed sufficient relevancy and materiality to warrant its reception,[97] or on the other hand that it fell short of these re-

[§ 2474] d. Weight and Sufficiency. The general rules on the subject of weight and sufficiency of evidence,[99] govern in determining the effect that should be accorded to the evidence submitted on the settlement of accounts.[1] Credits claimed by the representative must be supported by testimony substantially sufficient to establish the facts before a jury,[2] and it has been held that, when a credit claimed for the payment of a debt of a decedent is contested, the personal representative must prove it by the same degree of evidence which the creditor himself would have been required to produce, if he had been forced to an action for its recovery,[3] although there is also authority for the view that so high a degree of proof is not required.[4]

[§ 2475] e. Vouchers and Proof of Payment—(1) In General. It is the duty of the representative of an estate to support every charge against it by competent evidence,[5] and for this purpose he is generally required to produce proper vouchers.[6] But such charges may be allowed without vouchers,[7] when the parties interested admit that they are correct,[8] or when a reasonable explanation of the failure to produce vouchers is offered,[9] as for example, that on account of the lapse of time or other special circumstances vouchers cannot be produced.[10] No voucher is necessary with respect to money paid to the representative to himself,[11] and the necessity for vouchers is sometimes dispensed with in respect to small items of payment or expenditure which are supported by the uncontradicted oath of the representative.[12]

Right to retain vouchers. Where an executor denied payments made by a deceased coexecutor, the representatives of the estate of the deceased coexecutor were entitled to retain the vouchers for the payments as a matter of protection to the estate.[13]

testant to show that the items paid by the personal representative and represented by the vouchers were not just debts or claims against the estate.[16] A voucher may, however, be impeached, by showing that it was obtained by fraud, that the signature thereto is forged, that the amount it represents was not due to him who executed it, that such amount has not in fact been paid, or that only a portion of it has been paid.[17]

[§ 2477] f. Examination of Representative. Statutes frequently provide for examining an executor or administrator upon oath as to any matter relating to his account.[18] Pursuant to such a provision the representative may be examined as to whether he is indebted to the estate,[19] or with respect to a liability of a corepresentative to decedent,[20] or the disposition of a balance shown by the account,[21] or the examination may be directed to a disclosure of assets of a partnership of which the representative and decedent were members,[22] or of property held by the representative during his administration in his own name, but in fact for the benefit of the estate.[23] An examination may be had, although formal objections have not been filed,[24] and notwithstanding the representative's verified denial that property has come into his hands.[25] But where the disputed charges are not properly matters of account between the representative and the estate, but are mere personal claims against the heirs in respect to which the relation of debtor and creditor exists between the heirs and the representative, a statute providing for the examination of the representative does not apply.[26] An executor or administrator is a competent witness in his own behalf on the settlement of his accounts,[27] and may be examined for any purpose,[28] although it has been held that he is not a competent witness as to facts occurring before the death of decedent.[29]

Entire statement to be considered. If a personal representative is examined under oath, for the purpose of charging him, a portion of his statements tending to charge him cannot be taken apart from an accompanying explanation operating in his favor.[30]

Admissibility of evidence to disprove answers. Where an administrator, in answer to interrogatories in the probate court touching his accounts, makes answers thereto, the party at whose instance the interrogatories have been proposed may offer evidence to disprove the answers.[31]

[§ 2478] g. Production of Books. An objecting creditor is entitled to full information as to collections made by the representative, who should be required, on proper notice being given him, to produce his books.[32]

[§ 2479] h. Examination of Legatees. Legatees are incompetent to testify in their own behalf as to matters occurring in the lifetime of decedent,[33] but are competent when called by a creditor in support of his claim against the estate.[34]

[§ 2480] 5. Findings and Conclusions. It is sometimes required that there shall be findings of fact and conclusions of law on the trial of objections or exceptions to the account of an executor or administrator,[35] and the propriety of such findings and conclusions, although not expressly required, has been recognized.[36] But on the other hand it has also been held that findings and conclusions are not required,[37] and that a question as to whether certain additional attorney's fees should be allowed is not one upon which propositions of law may properly be submitted.[38] It has been held that special findings made upon exceptions to an administrator's report need not set out all the various items of the report,[39] but only those items relating to the issues raised by the exceptions.[40] But it has also been asserted that the findings should state what items are allowed, and what rejected.[41] Specific findings of fact, approving separately a long list of items allowed on final settlement, are properly refused.[42] A claim of which the record contains no evidence should not be included in a finding in a decree sustaining objections to the report of the representative.[43] The rule that, where the court makes a special finding, failure to find a material fact is equivalent to a finding of such fact against the party having the burden of proof applies to the settlement of an executor's accounts.[44]

Exceptions to conclusions of law, made upon findings upon the hearing of exceptions to an administratrix's report, admit the correctness of the findings.[45]

[§ 2481] 6. Order or Decree. On the settlement of the accounts of an executor or administrator there should be an order or decree,[46] which should be signed by the judge,[47] and should bear date and take effect as of the time when it is officially announced.[48] It should comply with the statutes and practice of the jurisdiction in which it is rendered,[49] and should conform to the exigencies of the particular case presented to the court.[50] A decree requiring an executor in the settlement of his final account to account for sums found to be due the estate must be based on the allegation composed of his final account, and the objections thereto and the proof.[51] A decree may be made without prejudice with any right of an alleged legatee.[52]

[a] Ordering payment of debts.—Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1647, providing that on settlement of the accounts of an administrator or executor the court shall make an order for the payment of the debts as the circumstances of the estate require, where on the settlement of an administrator's third account a balance of cash was shown to be in the hands of the administrator, it was error for the court to refuse to grant an order for the payment of debts, and to make an order merely directing the administrator to close the estate and have the proceeds thereof distributed among the creditors at the earliest possible date. In re Sylvar, 1 Cal. A. 35, 81 P 663.

[a] Protecting contingent claim.—Where the executrix and sole legatee in her report and objection to a contingent claim filed against the estate admitted the validity of the claim upon a personal guaranty made by decedent of the payment of corporate bonds, and only objected thereto on the ground that the estate's liability thereon was uncertain, and that she wanted to close the estate, and was willing to assume personal liability on the claim in order to do so, the court should have protected the contingent claimant by approving the final report, subject to a liability against the estate for any amount thereafter found to be due on decedent's guaranty, the pleadings having admitted the existence of a valid contingent claim. In re Mardis, 148 Iowa 740, 127 NW 1021.

[b] Setting aside previous allowance of claim.—Allowance of a claim by the court is not conclusive against an heir excepting to the administrator's final report, but the court, in adjusting the account, may exercise powers of equity and set aside its previous judgment allowing it and require the final report to be surcharged with all matters improperly allowed by its previous order. Whittemore v. Coleman, 239 Ill. 450, 88 NE 228.

[c] Provision with respect to security.—Where as the accounts of the executors and trustees stood when passed by the prerogative court, the trustees were prima facie chargeable to the cestuis que trust for the full value of a bond and mortgage executed by one of the executors and trustees with her husband to secure a debt to the estate, they will not be required to proceed to realize a security by proceedings to foreclose and subsequent suit on the bond, it being a matter for the sound discretion of the other executors and of them alone. Van Houten v. Stevenson, 74 N. J. Eq. 1, 77 A 612.

[d] Distribution of corporate stock.—Where it appeared that the estate held a controlling interest in the stock of a corporation, and it was agreed by the parties that it was not advisable to sell the stock, it was proper to order a distribution thereof whereby the management of the corporation passed into the hands of the guardian and relatives of an infant daughter of the intestate, there being no showing that these persons were not capable of managing the corporation. [e] Allowing interest.—Where the objection to the allowance of a credit in an executor's final account did not require him to account for interest on the amount thereof, and there was no declaration in the exception of any sum due as compensation for the use of money on account of the item, interest could not be allowed on the amount of the credit on the same being disallowed. [a] A decree in favor of "heirs when known" is insufficient. Lyon v. Odom, 31 Ala. 234.

[b] Decree for one representative against another.—The only case in which a decree is authorized in favor and specify a person against whom it can be enforced by proper process of the court;[56] but it should not provide for relief not demanded.[57] The court should provide for the payment of commissions, expenses, and all necessary future disbursements, and so should not order a balance of cash to be distributed until the final winding up of the estate.[58]

Probate allowances in favor of creditors or third persons are directed, not against the executor or administrator personally or his property, but against the assets of the estate in his hands; the matter of inquiry lies between the creditor or third person and the estate and the executor or administrator has no personal interest or responsibility concerning it;[59] but when it comes to a final settlement the whole contest if any is between the estate and the executor or administrator, and the result of the contest, if adverse to him, charges him personally and the judgment therefore should run not against the estate but against him.[60]

Where a personal representative is also guardian of decedent's children, a separate decree must be rendered on his separate accounts as guardian of each ward and as personal representative.[61]

Informal and irregular decrees. The fact that a decree is irregular in form does not constitute reversible error when no injury appears to have resulted therefrom,[62] and an order made on the records of the probate court after the presentation of a final account, that "the final account be filed and recorded," has been held to be a sufficient judgment of ratification of the account, although no formal judgment of allowance was entered.[63] But it has been held that an entry made upon an account itself of "received and ordered for record" which is signed by the probate judge, but is not dated and not entered upon the minutes of the court, cannot be regarded as an order or judgment of the court and is no evidence of a settlement or allowance of the account by the court.[64] A judgment finally disposing of a suit of an executor for settlement of his accounts, although not in words confirming the settlement and discharging the executor, necessarily has such effect, where no exceptions to the settlement were filed.[65] Where certain exceptions to an executor's report were sustained, and an amended report ordered filed, which, when filed, was approved, it became the judgment of the court, so that the objector's exceptions were effective to test the correctness of the court's conclusions, unless the amendments cured the error.[66]

When not deemed consented to. A final order settling an estate is not deemed to have been by consent where it was entered in the usual way, notwithstanding it appears from the order that the parties in interest consented to the approval of the report of the executors and to their discharge.[67]

Amendment, correction, or modification. Where no material injury results, the order or decree may be amended, corrected, or modified by the court.[68]

Construction. In construing the decree, the inof one personal representative against another is where there has been a removal, resignation, or a revocation of the letters of an executor or administrator, or from some other cause his authority ceases. In such case the decree may be rendered in favor of the remaining or succeeding executor or administrator. Cook v. Cook, 69 Ala. 294.

[c] In favor of guardian ad litem.—On the settlement of an estate, a decree may be made in favor of an infant's guardian ad litem, and execution may issue thereon, although the proceeds should be paid into court, to be taken out only by a general guardian. Morgan v. Morgan, 35 Ala. 303.

[d] No judgment in favor of heirs filing no opposition.—Where one of several heirs opposes the account filed by an administrator, and such account in due time is homologated so far as not opposed, judgment should not be rendered against the administrator in favor of the heirs who have filed no oppositions. Wiemann's Succ., 112 La. 293, 36 S 354.

[e] When balance in favor of representative.—If the decree rendered on the final settlement of the account of a personal representative ascertains the amount of his indebtedness and the credits to which he is entitled, showing a balance in his favor, it is valid and binding until reversed, although it is rendered in favor of no one and no execution could have issued on it. Hutton v. Williams, 60 Ala. 107.

[f] Waiver of irregularity.—Although, in a suit by an administrator de bonis non against the representative of the first administrator for a settlement of the first administrator's accounts of his administration, it is irregular to decree payment to the administrator de bonis non, yet, where the distributees are parties to the suit, and do not complain, so that a payment to the administrator de bonis non would be a valid discharge to the representative of the first administrator, the decree will not be reversed for such irregularity. [b] Lien on real estate.—(1) The real estate of a personal representative becomes subject to a lien upon the filing of a transcript showing the amount appearing to be due and in his hands, on the settlement of his accounts in the orphans' court. tention of the court must be ascertained, when possible, and the decree given effect in conformity thereto.[69] Where the order confirms the account of an executor who is required to pay a specified sum to a legatee, it makes the legatee a creditor of the executor.[70]

Where an administrator has delayed his final accounting for many years, and any errors in the accounting are due to the loose methods of the administrator, all doubts as to the validity of a judgment sustaining exceptions to such an accounting will be resolved against the administrator.[71]

An order for the payment of a dividend on an accounting by an administrator is not, strictly speaking, a part of the proceeding for the settlement of the account, or of the adjudication respecting the claims reported therein, so that the parties to whom the dividends are payable do not thereby become parties to the accounting.[72]

Incidental or final determination. In the order or decree the determination may be as to incidental[73] or final[74] matters, depending upon the circumstances of the case. An order or decree of final settlement necessarily means a determination of all matters proper to be included therein, unless they are excepted therefrom in accordance with express statutory provisions;[75] but a provision which expressly continues the estate for further administration with respect to certain matters excludes the idea of final settlement.[76] Such a decree determines nothing beyond the amount received and paid out by the representative, and, unless the two amounts balance each other, the balance in his hands belonging to the estate, or due to him from it.[77]

Enforcement.[78] A decree directing the executor to pay a specified amount which the decree finds the executor owes the estate establishes the amount due from the executor, and to whom payable, and can be docketed and enforced as a judgment of the supreme court.[79]

[§ 2482] H. Operation and Effect—1. Final Settlement[80]—a. In General. The general rule is that a decree rendered on the final settlement of a personal representative has the force and effect of a judgment and is conclusive on the parties to the accounting and settlement as to the matters properly determined therein, until it is set aside for proper cause or reversed on appeal,[81] although there is some authority for the view that a final set-

[a] Thus, where a decree on an executor's final account provided that he should pay over to contestant all interest, income, or other accretion which came into his hands subsequent to the verification of his account, provided that the amount thereof should be determined and adjudged, together with the commissions and allowances for necessary expenses due the executor "on account thereof" by supplemental account to be made and filed, contestant was not prejudiced by a modification of the order on the theory that it limited the executor's allowance and expenses incurred on such supplemental account, so as to provide for a final accounting and the allowance of legitimate expenses incurred in the management of the estate subsequent to the prior accounting. Matter of Hull, 120 App. Div. 674, 105 NYS 961.

[a] Rule applied.—(1) Where the court stated in its order approving an executor's report that the executor made due proof of the publication of notice of the filing of his final report, such statement was not a finding that the executor made proof that a nonresident heir had been duly notified by publication, in accordance with the court's direction. Reizer v. Mertz, 223 Ill. 555, 79 NE 283 [rev 125 Ill. A. 425]. (2) Where an administrator in a suit to settle the estate made three settlements with the master commissioner in which he reported all cash collected on claims due the estate, and cash received from the purchaser of certain real estate at the time of each settlement, and the widow filed exceptions to the first two reports, including an exception to a report charging the administrator with cash received as purchase money on the real estate, and the court sustained the exceptions, it was an interlocutory order, and where it did not expressly adjudge that the administrator had no right to sell the real estate, and there was no order directing the commissioner to refund to him the amounts turned over as receipts of the sale, and the deed made the purchaser was not declared void, nor the purchaser directed to surrender possession, but the court afterward ordered the commissioner to pay out to the creditors, one of whom was the widow, all the money received from the sale of the real estate paid over to him by the administrator, the order sustaining the exceptions to the report did not decide that the executor had no authority to make the sale of real estate. Harding v. Weisiger, 109 SW 890, 33 KyL 170. (3) Where, in an accounting by executors, it appeared that they had unlawfully invested in securities, but that such securities had a value, and the decree of the probate court charged them with the difference between such value and the amount expended, and on appeal the charge was affirmed, but the decree provided that all the investments in question were disapproved, the decree should be construed as meaning that the executors were liable merely for the loss, and not that they should not be allowed the sum which was the actual value of the securities. tlement, approved by the court, is only prima facie evidence,[82] and the allowance of an item in an administrator's account without evidence on file in support thereof has been held to be not even prima facie correct as between the parties.[83] In order that the settlement shall have this conclusive effect, it is necessary that it should have been made in accordance with the statutory requirements relating to such settlements,[84] although presumptions of regularity are to be indulged with respect to such settlements.[85] A final settlement made without notice is not conclusive, although it should be treated as prima facie correct.[86] Where there is a total lack of appropriate parties to the proceedings, resulting in a defect of jurisdiction, the settlement is not conclusive,[87] although after a lapse of twenty years it will be presumed, in support of a final settlement, that proper notices were given and all necessary parties brought in, notwithstanding a failure of the record to show these matters.[88] It has also been held that a settlement made in vacation is invalid and of no effect,[89] as is also a judgment homologating the account of an administrator, made without any evidence as to the correctness of the account.[90]

What constitutes final settlement. In order that a settlement of the account of the executor or administrator shall be regarded as final and conclusive, it must mark the termination of the administration of the estate.[91] So an executor on whom the will imposes duties as trustee continues liable as executor until he is discharged as such and there is a severance of the fund, and the mere settlement of his executor's accounts does not discharge him in the absence of a provision to that effect in the decree.[92]

Closing of estate. Until the probate court has ordered the administrator of an estate discharged, the estate is not closed, and a final settlement therein is not a binding judgment, although approved by the court.[93]

Interest on awards. When an adjudication upon executors' accounts has been confirmed absolutely, the awards, whether to creditors or legatees, become final judgments, and, if not promptly paid, bear interest from that date.[94]

Form of settlement not affecting distributive shares. In a case where adult heirs, as parties of the first part, and the widow and a third person to be appointed as guardian for a minor heir, as parties of the second part, entered into a contract

[a] Proceeding characterized as in rem.—Such proceedings have been said not to be, as a rule, in personam but in rem, and if regular, binding upon all persons equally, whether they appear personally to take part in the controversies or proceedings or hold themselves aloof. Matter of Crawford, 21 Oh. Cir. Ct. 554, 11 Oh. Cir. Dec. 605 [aff 68 Oh. St. 58, 67 NE 156, 96 AmSR 648].

[b] No further accounting as to trust.—Where executors of a deceased trustee have had their discharge under the surrogate's decree, and accounted for and distributed all of the assets of the estate which came into their hands, they cannot be required to account further in an executorial capacity as to a trust declared by testator, in the absence of proof of any claim which would show either knowledge on their part of the existence of a trust fund, or that any such fund ever came into their hands, or that they had any assets out of which unliquidated claims against the fund could be paid. [a] Reports held final.—(1) Where an administratrix filed her final report, and on the hearing additions to sums in her hands were made, which additions consisted of property not inventoried and a sum received for property in excess of the appraisement, the corrected report, whether corrected by the court or by the administratrix on the court's order, became the final report, which the court properly approved and then discharged her from further liabilities. Hartzell v. Hartzell, 37 Ind. A. 481, 76 NE 439. (2) Where, under a will giving a life estate in personalty to the testator's widow, she was entitled to the possession for life of the securities and cash left by him, an account passed by the orphans' court filed by the widow and another, as executors, charging themselves with receipts, allowing credits for payments and disbursements, and then reciting that the balance consisting of certain securities and twenty-three thousand dollars in cash was retained by the widow under the terms and conditions of the will to be held by her during her natural life, showed a full and complete administration of the estate, and the widow thereafter held it not as executrix but as life tenant, especially where of the twenty-three thousand dollars retained by her the bulk had previously been invested by her under orders of the court. Foley v. Syer, 121 Md. 79, 88 A 38.

[b] Surcharge necessary to finality.—Until an executor's account, after having been confirmed, is surcharged, it is mere evidence, and not a final settlement. Owens v. Owens, 109 Va. 432, 63 SE 990.

[c] Action not final.—The approval by the court of a report of an administrator of a sale of realty to pay debts of the estate, the payment of certain debts, and a dividend on others does not settle the estate. Atherton v. Hughes, 249 Ill. 317, 94 NE 546.

[d] The fact that the representative regarded an account as his final account does not make it such where it was not so accepted by the probate judge and no notice was given thereon as a final account. McKenzie v. Muchmore, 104 Me. 320, 71 A 1032.

whereby the parties of the second part assumed the payment of two notes executed by one of the adults, and whereby certain property should be turned over to the adults and whereby they released their interest in certain property in favor of the widow and minor heir, and as administratrix filed an account stated on the theory of ascertaining what the shares of each in the personalty would have been if no agreement had been made and showing a performance of the agreement, and paid the notes, charging them on the credit and debit sides of her account, it was held that the form of accounting did not increase or diminish the shares of the adults for purposes of distribution of the remainder of the estate.[95]

[a] The decree is conclusive as to: (1) The amount of property received by the representative and the amounts disbursed in paying debts and expenses of administration. Remshard v. Renshaw, 102 Ark. 309, 143 SW 1092. (2) The correctness of the items set out in the account and directly acted upon by the court. App v. Dreisbach, 2 Rawle (Pa.) 287, 21 AmD 447. (3) The assignment of a share of the estate. Armstrong v. Stone, 64 Misc. 504, 118 NYS 998.

[b] Payment of debts.—Where a probate court makes an order of final settlement of an estate and discharges the personal representative, such action involves a consideration and approval of payments made by the representative, and if the court has jurisdiction to declare the estate settled such payments are thereby ratified. Peo. v. Medart, 166 Ill. 348, 46 NE 1095 [aff 63 Ill. A. 111].

[c] A decree allowing compensation (1) to the personal representative and fixing the amount thereof is conclusive as to that matter. Barney v. Saunders, 16 How. (U. S.) 535, 14 L. ed. 1047; Campbell v. Strong, 4 F. Cas. No. 2,367a, Hempst. 265; Ringgold v. Stone, 20 Ark. 526; Simonds v. Creswell, 10 La. Ann. 318; Thomas v. Frederick County School, 9 Gill & J. Eq. 889 mem, 19 A 622 mem]; Matter of Prentice, 25 App. Div. 209, 49 NYS 353. (2) An order of the probate court in the final settlement of the administration of an estate, by joint administrators, awarding a certain sum to one of the administrators for extra services is not, however, a conclusive adjudication against the other administrator as to the right of the one, to whom the allowance was made, to the entire sum so awarded. Oakley v. Oakley, 111 Ala. 506, 20 S 335. (3) Where the probate court ordered a payment to an attorney of the administrator on account of extraordinary services, the allowance of a further sum was not precluded for the words "on account" might well have been used to indicate that the allowance was not intended as compensation in full. In re Ross, (Cal.) 182 P 303.

[d] The determination of the rights of a widow by the probate court on final settlement of her husband's administrator with her consent had the effect of a final judgment. Wyatt v. Wilhite, 192 Mo. A. 551, 183 SW 1107.

jurisdiction of the court.[7] The settlement is not conclusive as to assets not accounted for in such statement or received thereafter, but as to such assets the personal representative may be required to make a further settlement.[8]

[§ 2485] d. Effect on Pending Actions. A final settlement made pending litigation against the estate is unwarranted and will not defeat a recovery; but the pending suit may proceed and judgment be rendered against the personal representative notwithstanding such settlement.[9]

[a] Interest on money received.—A settlement of an administrator's account, in which he does not charge himself with interest on money received, does not preclude a subsequent inquiry as to charging him with such interest; but, if there is an adjudication as to the matter of interest, the settlement is conclusive, unless the administrator was guilty of fraud. Saxton v. Chamberlain, 6 Pick. (Mass.) 422.

[b] Evidence of funds unaccounted for.—In an action by the heirs of the testator, the homologation of the executor's account is no bar to the introduction of evidence to show that the executor had received funds for which he had not accounted, or failed to put in any previous account, when it is offered before he has been discharged. Johnston v. Cox, 13 La. 536.

Court. After a personal representative has made a final settlement and has resigned or been discharged, and the administration has been closed, the jurisdiction of the probate court ceases.[10] But a final settlement without a discharge does not divest such jurisdiction.[11]

[§ 2487] f. Collateral Attack. An order or decree rendered on the final settlement of a personal representative is not subject to collateral attack,[12] except in cases where the court acted without jurisdiction[13] or the order or decree is of a character such as the court had no power to make under any circumstances.[14]

[§ 2488] 2. Ex Parte Settlements. The general rule, which is established by express statute in some jurisdictions, is that ex parte settlements of accounts by executors or administrators are prima facie evidence of their correctness but are not conclusive.[15] Such settlement may have the

[b] However (1) it has been held that in an action to establish a trust in plaintiff's favor against a person purchasing real estate at a foreclosure sale, wherein it was claimed that defendant purchased the property as administrator of the mortgagor, for the benefit of his intestate's estate, and in which defendant rendered an account charging the estate with certain liens on the property paid off by him, defendant's accounts as administrator were properly collaterally inquired into, and certain moneys received by him in that capacity, applicable to the discharge of those liens, charged against him as offsets. Abell v. Bradner, 15 NYS 64. (2) The possibility of collateral attack was also recognized in Lippincott v. Bechtold, 54 N. J. Eq. 407, 34 A 1079 (holding that a decree of the orphans' court allowing an executor's account, made after due publication, will, even though irregular, cast upon those who seek to impugn the account collaterally the burden of proving its incorrectness).

[c] The failure to present a claim to an executor before the court settles the executor's account and directs the payment of the claim, and does not go to the court's jurisdiction, so as to make the decree subject to collateral attack. L. Harter Co. v. Geisel, 18 Cal. A. 282, 122 P 1094.

force and effect of a stated account.[16] The fact that it appears from an ex parte settlement of an executor's accounts that he paid certain debts out of their order of priority does not raise the presumption of payment of all other debts having priority over those paid.[17] A bill to surcharge and falsify such a settlement must specify wherein it is erroneous,[18] and the burden of proving error or impropriety rests upon the one who seeks to impeach the correctness of the settlement.[19] The right to attack such a settlement may be lost by a delay for such a length of time and under such circumstances as to constitute laches.[20]

[§ 2489] 3. W. Va.—Dearing v. Selvey, 50 W. Va. 4, 40 SE 478; Kyle v. Kyle, 25 W. Va. 376.

"A partial or annual account of an executor or administrator is usually an ex parte proceeding, and is only a judgment de bene esse and only prima presumption being, however, on the party impeaching such a settlement.[22] Indeed such settlements have been denied any recognition at all as evidence,[23] at least when not made in conformity with the statutes.[24] Such settlements have also been held open to collateral attack.[25] On the other hand statutes sometimes make such settlements conclusive if they are not objected to within a certain time.[26]

As to any matters contested and adjudicated on such settlements, the usual rule as to adjudications by the courts applies, and the parties contesting are concluded,[27] and the same rule applies when notice of the settlement is given and no objections are presented.[28]

As against the representative and in favor of the estate an ex parte partial settlement has been regarded as conclusive except in cases of errors arising from oversight, mistake, or miscalculation,[29] although there is also authority for the contrary view;[30] and it has been held that the statement of an account in the court of probate is not an adfacie correct, and, although not excepted to or appealed from, is open to subsequent correction or challenge." Bliss v. Seaman, 165 Ill. 422, 46 NE 279.

"There is a great difference between ordinary annual settlements, and what is technically known as a final settlement. The former is simply a statement of the administrator, that he has received such amounts, and paid out such; and the approval finds that statement to be true. It is therefore in the nature of an adjudication, a judicial determination. But it is, so to speak, only a present adjudication, and prima facie correct—one made for the purpose of enabling the court to keep watch of the estate, and to control the disposition of its assets, and the payment of its debts. Unquestioned, it is accepted as an adjudication, and made the basis and starting point of further administration. But it may be challenged without appeal, and in the same court, and without motion for rehearing, or any direct proceedings to set it aside; and any errors or mistakes in it may be corrected at any subsequent settlement. . . . These accounts are settled ex parte, and without even the pretense of notice by publication or otherwise to any parties interested. But the final settlement of an estate is a more stringent and less easily avoided adjudication. It is more emphatically a judgment. True, it may by the probate court be opened up, and the administration continued; but this requires a direct proceeding therefor. While generally ex parte, yet it can only be made upon notice." Musick v. Beebe, 17 Kan. 47, 53.

[a] A construction given a will on a partial distribution, by the judge of the orphans' court, to which no exceptions are filed and from which no appeal is taken, is not res adjudicata on the subsequent adjudication in the orphans' court of an account covering another portion of the estate. In re Kellerman, 242 Pa. 3, 88 A 865 [aff 52 Pa. Super. 412].

[b] The amount paid to an heir or legatee on the first annual settlement of an administrator is not evidence as to what such person's interest will amount to after final settlement and an order of distribution. Elam v. Bond, 169 Mo. A. 584, 154 SW 880.

mission that the balance shown by it is actually in hand,[31] although it raises a presumption to that effect.[32]

An improper allowance of commissions by the auditing judge in one account, where no objection was made, will not prevent a disallowance of similar commissions on a subsequent accounting where exception thereto is taken.[33]

Effect as starting limitations. A decree settling the accounts of the executors except that they were ordered to retain a certain sum with which to pay any judgment which a person claiming a legacy might get against them was a "judicial settlement," the effect of which was to start limitations running against claimant of the legacy, who was a party to the accounting proceeding.[34]

As to items not included in an annual or partial settlement, it can have no effect whatever.[35]

[§ 2490] 4. Settlement on Resignation, Removal, or Death. A settlement made by a personal representative who resigns his trust or is removed while the estate remains unsettled is not a final settlement of the estate,[36] but is to be regarded as the final settlement of the outgoing representative,[37] and binds all persons interested as to the matters embraced in such settlement until it is set aside in some direct proceeding.[38]

Legatees and distributees are bound by a settlement made in good faith and in the absence of fraud and collusion between the representative of a deceased representative and his corepresentative,[39] or successor,[40] or between an outgoing representative and his successor,[41] although as to the successor such a settlement is to be regarded as prima facie evidence only.[42]

Settlement before appointment of successor. Since a retiring representative must make his settlement with his successor, no final settlement can be made by him until his successor is appointed, and a purported final settlement made by him before such appointment will have the force of an annual settlement only.[43]

[§ 2491] I. Opening, Vacating, or Setting Aside Settlements—1. Jurisdiction—a. [a] Suit in equity not a collateral attack.—A suit to vacate an order approving an administrator's final settlement is a direct, and not a collateral, attack thereon, although plaintiff seeks other relief in the same suit. Johnson v. Filtsch, 37 Okl. 510, 138 P 165, 42 Okl. 64, 138 P 806.

[b] Unconfirmed settlements. — A suit in equity will not be entertained to correct frauds in unconfirmed settlements of an executor's accounts; and if an executor has settled his accounts several times, and another settlement is pending in the probate court, his failure to charge himself with certain assets in any of the settlements cannot be the subject of an equitable suit. Hankins v. Layne, 48 Ark. 544, 3 SW 821.

the settlement and ordering a new settlement in the probate court; it cannot assume the jurisdiction of the probate court and have the settlement made in its own forum.[47]

[§ 2492] b. Probate Courts. It has been held that a probate court may open or vacate its own decree on the final settlement of an estate during the term at which such decree was rendered,[48] but it has also been asserted that, where courts of probate are open at all times and no terms thereof are provided by law they have not the power of vacating their judgments during the terms at which they are rendered, like courts having regular terms.[49] In a number of states the power of a probate court to disturb a judgment or decree of final settlement after the expiration of the term at which it was rendered has been denied,[50] although in other states, either by virtue or inherent equity jurisdiction or as a result of express statutory enactment, probate courts are held to have the same powers as courts of equity with respect to their vacation or setting aside a decree of final settlement.[51]

[§ 2493] 2. Grounds for Relief—a. In General. The grounds, other than statutory ones,[52] on which a court of equity or a court of probate in the exercise of equity jurisdiction will relieve against a final settlement are fraud, accident, or mistake.[53]

fraud which will warrant setting aside a final settlement may be positive and actual, with wrongful intent,[54] but it need not be such,[55] for any improper act or concealment that operates as fraud and results in loss will be sufficient regardless of the motive.[56] The fraud must relate to the procurement of the judgment,[57] but the matter complained of must be something extrinsic or collateral to the matter tried upon the original hearing, and not a fraud or mistake in the very matter on which the judgment was entered or order made.[58] A willful omission from the account or concealment of assets constitutes a fraud for which a settlement may be set aside.[59] A final settlement will not be interfered with on account of mere errors or irregularities,[60] unless they are sufficiently gross to raise a

[a] Returning a false inventory is a fraud for which a final settlement may be set aside. West v. Reavis, 13 Ind. 294.

[b] False representation by administrator.—A final settlement will be set aside in equity where the administrator, for the purpose of inducing the distributees not to object to the allowance of a certain credit, represented the credit to be correct and made statements as to the circumstances out of which the credit grew which, if true, plainly demonstrated its correctness, and the distributees, being ignorant of the circumstances, relied on such statements and representations. Mock v. Steele, 34 Ala. 198, 73 AmD 455.

[c] Improper credits.—(1) It is a fraud on the estate for which a final settlement will be set aside, where an executor or administrator takes a credit to which he is not entitled in any view of the case. Houts v. Shepherd, 79 Mo. 141. (2) An administrator was guilty of fraud where he obtained credit for money which he knew he had never paid out. Morrow v. Allison, 39 Ala. 70. (3) It was considered fraudulent for an executor to obtain credit for the full amount of a note which he settled at a considerable discount. Matter of Beach, 3 Misc. 393, 24 NYS 717, 1 Pow. Surr. 469. (4) Where an administrator has entered into an agreement limiting the amount to be allowed him for compensation and attorney's fees, he is guilty of fraud in taking credit for a larger sum. Froebrick v. Lane, 45 Or. 13, 76 P 351, 106 AmSR 634. (5) It is not fraudulent to obtain credit for disbursements actually made, although they were improper. Sorrels v. Trantham, 48 Ark. 386, 3 SW 198, 4 SW 281 (taxes paid without order of court). (6) An executor is not chargeable with actual fraud because he is credited with one or two items not in fact paid, where the account was made out by his attorney in his absence and without his knowledge. Williams v. Rhodes, 81 Ill. 571.

[d] Concealment.—Where an administrator concealed from the court on his final accounting that he did not have funds belonging to the estate, which his report represented had been paid over to the guardian of minor heirs, and the administrator obtained his discharge on the representation that such funds had been so paid over in cash, when in fact only notes had been given and accepted by the guardian therefor, such acts constituted a fraud on the court authorizing the vacation of the order discharging such administrator. Tucker v. Stewart, 121 Iowa 714, 97 NW 148.

[e] Fraud in obtaining allowance of claim.—It is fraud for an administrator to obtain an allowance to himself for the whole amount of a claim assigned to him by a former administrator of the deceased without deducting the amount in which his assignor is indebted to the estate. He should set off one debt against the other and take the allowance for the difference. Sorrels v. Trantham, 48 Ark. 386, 3 SW 198, 4 SW 281.

[f] Mistake caused by complainant.—Equity will not relieve against a mistake which the complainant was instrumental in causing, or which occurred by reason of his negligence. Griffith v. Vertner, 6 Miss. 736.

[g] Mistake as to value of securities.—Where executors filed a final account charging themselves with a certain amount, the fact that a part of that amount consisted of securities which they then supposed were good, but which they afterward failed to collect, is not a mistake for which they can obtain relief in equity six years thereafter. Beatty v. Cory Universalist Soc., 39 N. J. Eq. 452 [rev on other grounds 41 N. J. Eq. 563, 7 A 338].

[h] Whether fraud appears on the face of an administration account is a question for the court and not for the jury. Burns v. Burton, 1 A. K. Marsh. (Ky.) 349.

[i] Where a beneficiary acquiesces in the misapplication of a fund directed to be paid to him by the order of distribtuion, he cannot have the account opened for fraud or manifest error. In re Koehnken, 27 Oh. Cir. Ct. 840.

[c] However, it has been held that there was no such fraud as would authorize a court of equity to review a final settlement of an estate where the executor failed to account for cattle which had been inventoried and appraised as assets of the estate, and gave such cattle to the widow as her separate property, and also charged commissions on an uncollected and worthless note. presumption of fraud,[61] nor are mere illegal allowances, unless obtained by fraud, ground for impeaching or setting aside a final settlement.[62] Neither will a final settlement be disturbed because of a mistake of law.[63] Matters which have not resulted in prejudice to any substantial right of any party interested in the estate do not furnish ground for setting aside the settlement.[64] Where the allowance of commission to an administrator on approval of his final settlement was induced by the negligence of plaintiff, there was no mistake or fraud entitling him to equitable relief.[65]

[§ 2494] b. Statutory Grounds. In some states statutes have been enacted enumerating the grounds upon which and the circumstances under which the final settlement of a personal representative may be set aside, opened, or otherwise disturbed. These statutes have been construed in numerous cases, which are referred to in the note,[66] but which it is deemed unnecessary to discuss in detail, because of their purely local interest, the varying provision of the statutes, and the liability of the statutory provisions under which they were decided to modification and repeal.

[§ 2495] 3. Time for Application. When the time within which relief against a settlement can be obtained is prescribed by statute, it must be sought before the expiration of that period.[67] The time from which the statutory period runs varies, being sometimes the time of final settlement[68] or confirmation of the final account,[69] and sometimes the time of the final discharge of the representative.[70] In the case of fraud, the statutory period has been held to run from the time of the discovery of the fraud by the party complaining thereof.[71] When there is no positive limitation of the period in which such relief may be sought, a decree of final settlement may be opened or vacated within any reasonable time after its rendition,[72] although such relief will be denied where there has been delay for so long a time or under such circumstances as to cause the application of the doctrine of laches.[73] It

[a] What amounts to laches depends upon the circumstances of each case. Richardson v. Billingslea, 69 Md. 407, 16 A 65.

[b] Negligence as to mistake.— The final settlement of an intestate estate will not be disturbed because of an overpayment by a debtor to the administrator, where the debtor has been negligent in allowing the mistake to be made, and has not shown reasonable diligence in seeking its correction after ascertaining it. Dickey v. Tyner, 85 Ind. 100.

[c] A delay of a little over a month before moving to vacate a decree does not constitute laches. Matter of Wicke, 74 App. Div. 221, 77 NYS 558; Matter of Walrath, 37 Misc. 696, 76 NYS 448, 3 Mills Surr. 37.

[d] A delay of eight months is not unreasonable. Froebrich v. Lane, 45 Or. 13, 76 P 351, 106 AmSR 634.

[e] A delay of four years in making application to open a settlement on the ground of mistake did not show laches, where there was no evidence that the mistake had been discovered within that time. Sipperly v. Baucus, 24 N. Y. 46.

[f] A delay of nearly five years is such laches as will bar a petition for review to rectify an alleged error in an account. Lewis' Est., 14 Pa. Dist. 422.

[g] A delay of eight years before the institution of a suit by legatees to surcharge and falsify the accounts of an executor is not sufficient ground for refusing relief, especially where one of the complainants was a female and under age when the settlement was in progress, although probably of full age when it was returned to the court of probate and recorded. Handly v. Snodgrass, 9 Leigh (36 Va.) 484.

[h] A delay of twelve years precludes relief. Littell v. Hackley, 126 Fed. 309, 61 CCA 295 [certiorari den 194 U. S. 635, 24 SCt 858, 48 L. ed. 1160]; Kelly's Est., 37 Pa. Super. 320.

[i] Acquiescence for fifteen years is sufficient to preclude the opening of a settlement which appears to have been voluntarily and intelligently made, although it may have been advantageous to a fiduciary. Pinson v. Puckett, 35 S. C. 178, 14 SE 393.

[j] A lapse of eighteen years may not prevent the correction of errors where no intervening rights will be prejudiced thereby. Shuster's Est., 26 Pa. Dist. 672.

[k] A lapse of twenty years (1) is sufficient to preclude relief. Washington v. Govan, 73 Ark. 612, 84 SW 792; Pennypacker's App., 14 Pa. 430. (2) After the lapse of such a time and the death of the parties a final account will not be reopened and revised, unless a very strong case of fraud is proved, or of clear accident or mistake. Taylor v. Benham, 5 How. (U. S.) 233, 12 L. ed. 130. (3) But a final account of twenty years' standing has been opened on the ground of fraud, where there had been no acquiescence, complainants having been prosecuting their claim in various forms during the whole time. Davis v. Cowdin, 20 Pick. (Mass.) 510.

[l] Twenty-six years' delay constitutes laches. Borland's App., 234 Pa. 280, 83 A 110.

(2) Aliter as to the guardian of a minor whose interest does not begin until expiration of an existing life estate. Price's Est., 12 Pa. Dist. 693.

[c] A domiciliary executor may attack the settlement of an ancillary administrator. Hall v. Pegram, 85 Ala. 522, 5 S 209, 6 S 612.

[d] Administrator de bonis non.— A former administrator or his representatives may be called upon by a new administrator, by a notice or upon a rule, to show cause why his account should not be opened for fraud or mistake. Crombie v. Engle, 19 N. J. L. 82 [rev on other grounds 21 N. J. L. 614]. Contra Murphey v. Menard, 11 Tex. 673.

[e] A surety of the representative (1) is entitled to attack the final settlement. Williamson v. Howell, 4 Ala. 693 (but only where the distributees participated in the fraud complained of, or colluded with the representative); Pierce v. Maetzold, 126 Minn. 445, 148 NW 302; In re Bishop, 10 Pa. 469; Simmons' Est., 12 Pa. Co. 139, 30 WklyNC 503; Shallcross' Est., 12 Phila. (Pa.) 158. (2) A surety cannot sue to set aside a decree which was not induced by fraud. Bodine v. Williamson, 134 App. Div. 688, 119 NYS 500. (3) The court will not sustain an attack by a surety who was present at the audit of the representative's account, at which exceptions were dismissed by the court, where the facts alleged in the petition were denied. Bush's App., 102 Pa. 502.

[f] Assignee for benefit of creditors.— Where an executor, in violation of duty, has squandered funds of the estate, and, subsequent to the settlement of a partial account, makes an assignment for the benefit of creditors, and then files his final account as executor in the probate court, the assignee may on leave given appear in such court and ask the correction of errors and mistakes in the accounts of such executor. Slagle v. Slagle, 3 Oh. Dec. (Reprint) 549.

[g] All creditors or heirs need not join.— In a proceeding under the statute for the revision and correction of the account of a personal representative, it is not necessary that all creditors or heirs should join as other person.[77] The representative cannot proceed to have a decree settling his accounts set aside for his own fraud,[78] nor can he move to correct a decree where the error complained of was due to his own fault.[79]

[§ 2497] 5. Parties. It has been laid down generally that all persons whose interest will be affected by opening, vacating, or setting aside are proper parties to the proceedings by which this is sought;[80] and where the statute requires the personal representative to be made a party to proceedings to set aside the final settlement, and the personal representative is also an heir, joining him in his capacity as heir is not equivalent to making him a party as personal representative.[81] But it has also been held that a statute providing that no final settlement shall be made and approved by the court unless the heirs have been notified thereof in such manner as the court may direct does not require notice to the heirs of a motion by an executor to set aside an order approving a final settlement and to fix his fees as executor.[82] An administrator de bonis non is not a proper party to a proceeding to set aside the settlement of his predecessor.[83] In a suit to correct credits in an administrator's final settlement, where it is not sought to recover, money paid by the administrator from the person to whom it was paid, and he is not charged with fraud or conspiracy in the allowance of the claim, the person receiving such payment is not a necessary party.[84] Where it is sought to correct an erroneous statement in the report of an executor that a claim in favor of plaintiff was paid, and the executor is deceased, it is not necessary that his heirs or personal representatives should be made parties.[85]

[§ 2498] 6. Process. It has been held that proceedings to vacate a decree settling an administrator's account may be initiated by order to show cause or notice of motion, citation being unnecessary.[86] The surety on an administrator's bond are entitled to notice of a proceeding to vacate a decree settling the administrator's account in voluntary proceedings.[87] Under a statute providing for service of process in like manner as summons in civil actions, and where writs, citations, and other process cannot be served in such manner in the state, that the probate court may, when necessary, order service by publication, the county court cannot order personal service on a nonresident minor in proceedings to vacate a judgment in probate proceedings, where no affidavit that he cannot be served in the state is on file.[88]

[§ 2499] 7. Pleadings—a. In General. In proceedings to open, vacate, or set aside a settlement there should be a petition or complaint,[89] in which proper grounds for relief[90] must be alleged;[91] and it must also be alleged that complainant's rights have been adversely affected by such settlement.[92] If the proceeding is brought on statutory grounds, such allegations must be made as to bring the case within the provisions of the statute.[93] A repre-

parties; such a proceeding may be prosecuted by any one interested in the estate. Hefflefinger v. George, 14 Tex. 569; Reese v. Hicks, 13 Tex. 162.

[h] Distinct rights.—Where an ancestor bequeathed his entire estate to his wife, who was also his executrix, for life, the right of the executor of a remainderman to surcharge the settlement of the executrix for fraudulent misappropriation of the capital of the estate was entirely distinct from, and independent of, his right to proceed against the widow as life tenant. Wren v. Wren, 126 Ky. 704, 104 SW 737, 31 KyL 1096.

[i] Where a creditor whose claim is rejected neglects to except to the administrator's final account and the distribution and to contest the same, and the account is settled and a decree of distribution rendered, he cannot have the order and decree set aside because no money was paid into the probate court to cover his claim. sentative seeking to set aside an account stated by the court must aver that he did not have notice and was not present.[94]

A superfluous allegation of fraud will not vitiate a complaint which is otherwise good.[95]

The capacity of a party who appears in court as the representative of another must be alleged,[96] although it need not be proved unless specifically denied.[97]

Where a creditor seeks relief by the opening or setting aside of a settlement, his petition must, it has been held, state facts which negative negligence on his part and excuse him from securing the allowance of his claim.[98]

[§ 2500] b. Certainty and Particularity in Allegations. Complainant's claim or title to relief should be stated with accuracy and clearness and with such certainty that defendant may be distinctly informed of the nature of the case which he is called on to meet, and matters essential to complainant's right to relief must appear not by inference, but by direct and unambiguous averments.[99] Accordingly, a bill or petition which contains only general charges of fraud, accident, or mistake, without specifying in what the fraud, accident, or mistake consists, is insufficient,[1] and in a proceeding

[b] Under the Indiana statute (1) authorizing the filing of a petition by a person interested in an estate who did not appear at the final settlement, and was not personally summoned, to have the settlement set aside for fraud or mistake, the petition must show that the petitioner did not appear and was not personally summoned. [a] Sufficient petitions.—(1) Under a statute, authorizing the setting aside of an administrator's final settlement on a petition setting forth any illegality or mistake in such settlement or in the prior administration proceedings, a petition, filed by the widow, showing that the settlement was made without payment of her allowance, and averring that the approval of the administrator's final report and the decree of final settlement were procured by a fraudulent statement that the heirs had settled with the widow and paid her allowance, when in fact they had not done so, and further showing a taking of improper credit by the administrator, and the wrongful application of assets which should have been used in payment of the allowance, states sufficient grounds for setting aside the settlement. It is not necessary for the widow to allege that she has not lost or waived her right to the allowance. Rush v. Kelly, 34 Ind. A. 449, 73 NE 130. (2) Where a bill to vacate a probate decree for fraud alleged the investment of some of complainants' funds in certain stock and bonds and that respondent held the proceeds of the bonds and only accounted for the stock, and so framed her account as to fraudulently mislead the court and complainants into the belief that she was accounting for all that had been received as the result of the investment, and complainants were ignorant until after the settlement as to the bonds purchased with the stock, which respondent fraudulently concealed from her account and inventory on final settlement, it stated grounds for equitable relief. Martinez v. Meyers, 167 Ala. 456, 52 S 592. (3) A petition which alleged the death of decedent, and that plaintiffs were his only heirs, an agreement for distribution, the appointment of an administrator, and the distribution of the estate, the one plaintiff's mental weakness, and that defendant administrator, with intent to defraud him presented an agreement and represented to him that the wife of such defendant, and certain others, were heirs, and entitled to share therein, and that unless plaintiff signed such agreement the whole estate would be squandered, and that, if he would sign such agreement and have defendant appointed administrator, plaintiff would receive five hundred dollars more than he was legally entitled to, and that, misled by such false statements plaintiff signed a certain receipt on request of the defendant by which defendant said he would receive five hundred dollars more than he was entitled to, all of which was false, and that he in fact signed the receipt without any consideration, and that defendant knew plaintiff was mentally weak, and that the persons alleged were not heirs to the estate, and that plaintiff had no knowledge of such fraud until within six months before the beginning of suit to set aside settlement of estate and discharge of administrator, stated a cause of action for relief against an order of the probate court alleged to have been procured by fraud. Weeke v. Wortmann, 77 Nebr. 407, 109 NW 503.

[b] An attack by sufficient allegations on an allowance to an administrator of commissions to which he is not entitled according to the allegations of the bill is a sufficient specification of an improper charge in a bill to surcharge such settlement. Taylor v. Taylor, 66 W. Va. 238, 66 SE 690, 19 AnnCas 414.

[c] Insufficient petition. — An averment that on the hearing of the final report no proof was made to the court that the proper notice of such hearing had been given is not equivalent to an averment that such notice had not been given, and is insufficient to authorize a setting aside of the final settlement. to surcharge and falsify, the bill or petition must specifically point out the errors, omissions, or false charges complained of.[2]

[§ 2501] c. Amendment. Where a demurrer to a bill by the sole heir and next of kin of a decedent to enjoin an impostor, who impersonated him on the final settlement, from collecting the amount decreed to be due to such heir, was sustained for want of equity, it was held proper to permit the bill to be amended so as to seek a correction of credits allowed the administrator upon the consent of the impostor.[3]

[§ 2503] 9. Hearing and Determination. The representative should be afforded an opportunity of meeting the charges on which the proceeding is based.[8] The findings should be consistent with the pleadings.[9] Whether or not a decree settling the account of an executor or administrator shall be opened, vacated, or set aside is a matter which rests largely in the discretion of the court,[10] and the court may impose any reasonable condition on vacating the decree.[11]

Stay of proceedings. Where a distributee brought an action in the supreme court against the administrator to set aside an agreement of distribution as fraudulent, and subsequently there was a petition in the surrogate's court to set aside the decree settling the accounts of the administrator, based on such alleged fraudulent agreement, it was held that trial of such proceeding should be stayed until a decision of the action in the supreme court.[12]

[§ 2504] 10. Effect of Opening or Setting Aside —a. In General. When the settlement of a personal representative is annulled by a court of competent jurisdiction, the rights and liabilities of the parties thereto are the same as if the settlement had never been made.[13] On a petition to open such a settlement and surcharge the account, it is proper so to open it as to correct errors on both sides;[14] and when a settlement is opened at the instance of the personal representative to correct mistakes for his benefit, other mistakes inuring to the benefit of persons interested in the estate will be corrected also.[15] Where a decree settling the accounts of administrators improperly adjudges that a claim has been rejected and is barred by the statute of limitations, there is no occasion for opening the decree further than may be necessary to preserve funds for the payment of the claim, if any is established.[16] Where one of several persons interested in an estate institutes a proceeding to revise the account of the personal representative thereof, if successful, it inures to the benefit of all persons similarly interested.[17] But the fact that a decree discharging a personal representative is vacated as to one distributee against whom the statute of limitations had not run, because of disability, does not inure to the benefit of others not under any disability, since the rights of all the distributees are entirely separate.[18]

[§ 2505] b. Distinction between Opening, and Surcharging and Falsifying. When errors or mistakes only are shown to exist in an account the settlement will not be opened, as will be done where fraud or accident affecting the entire action of the probate court is shown; but the person alleging the error or mistake in the account will be permitted to surcharge and falsify it.[19] The distinction between opening an account and surcharging and falsifying it is that when an account is opened the whole of it becomes subject to review, while when it is merely surcharged and falsified the inquiry is limited to particular items alleged to have been improperly included or omitted, and in all other respects the account is left to stand as it is.[20]

[§ 2506] 11. Effect or Refusal to Open Accounting. An order dismissing a petition to open the accounts of an executor and to allow a claim of the petitioner against decedent's estate does not affect the right of the petitioner to enforce his claim at law or in equity.[21]

[§ 2507] 12. Annual or Partial Settlements. An annual or partial settlement, being usually ex parte and only prima facie correct,[22] is liable to be impeached, surcharged and falsified, or opened for correction either on a subsequent annual or partial settlement or upon the final settlement itself.[23] But as such settlements are conclusive as to matters contested and adjudicated thereon,[24] they can be opened or set aside as to such matters only in the same manner as final settlements.[25] The correction of mistakes in annual or partial settlements is some-

"The distinction between opening an account, and surcharging and falsifying it, is important; because, when opened, the whole of it may be unraveled; but when permission is given merely to surcharge and falsify, the onus is upon the party who alleges mistakes to prove them. The account, prima facie, stands as correct; and if the party can show an omission for which he should have a credit, it is added (surcharged); or, if a wrong charge has been made against him, it is deducted, which is called a falsification." Question not considered. In an action by creditors of a decedent to have lands held by his widow, who was his administratrix, which were redeemed from mortgages by the use of general assets of the estate under order of the probate court, and sold by authority of the court, declared held in trust for their benefit, and seeking that the administration accounts be surcharged and falsified, the claim of the widow to certain credits as administratrix, which the probate court authorized her to take at some future settlement to be filed by her, and for which she had not asked credit in any settlement, will not be considered, her administration being still open.[28]

[§ 2508] J. Review—1. In General. The decrees and orders of probate courts rendered upon the settlements of personal representatives are ordinarily, like other decrees and orders, subject to review by appeal or writ of error,[29] although in the absence of any statute authorizing an appeal from such a judgment, the right of appeal has been denied.[30] In a proper case a writ of certiorari will lie to review such an order or decree.[31]

allowed from any order which affects a substantial right,[34] even though it is not final.[35] Usually the allowance of an annual or partial settlement is not regarded as a final decree or order from which an appeal can be taken,[36] although a different rule is sometimes established by statute.[37] No appeal lies from the refusal of the probate court to allow an account informally presented by a personal representative without a settlement in due form,[38] or from its refusal to make an order as to a matter entirely within its discretion.[39] It is usually held that an appeal will lie from an order or decree of the probate court setting aside,[40] or refusing to set aside,[41] a former decree rendered on the final settlement of an administration account, and from the denial of a motion made on the final accounting of a personal representative to direct him to pay counsel fees.[42]

An appeal may be taken from a part of a final order or judgment if the part whereby appellant is aggrieved is so far distinct and independent that it may be adjudicated on appeal without bringing up for review the entire order or judgment.[43] However, an appeal will not lie from a disallowance of certain items in an administrator's account, but must be taken from the order itself, so as to bring up the entire matter and permit a rehearing upon each and every item of the account.[44]

Order not appealable because of inadvertent omission. Where an item in an administrator's account is allowed by the court, but inadvertently omitted from its order, an appeal is not justified, since the order could no doubt be corrected by calling the court's attention to such omission.[45]

A void order may, it has been said, be appealable,[46] although a contrary view has also been expressed.[47]

[§ 2510] 3. Persons Entitled to Review—a. In General. The general rules that any party aggrieved by a judgment or decree may appeal therefrom,[48] and that in a legal sense a party is aggrieved by a judgment or decree whenever it operates on his rights of property or bears directly upon his interest[49] apply in proceedings for the settlement of administration accounts;[50] and, conversely, one cannot appeal from a judgment or order rendered in such a proceeding unless he is, either as an individual or in a representative capacity, aggrieved thereby, in that it prejudicially affects his rights of property or pecuniary interests, or those of others for whom he is, with relation to such proceeding, the duly constituted representative.[51]

[a] Reason for rule.—"Until surcharged and falsified in the manner indicated by statute, the ex parte settlement, although confirmed by the order of the court, is mere matter of evidence, and an order of this court affirming the order of the chancery court would not make the ex parte settlement any more final than it was before the appeal was taken. It could still be questioned by a bill to surcharge and falsify; so that an appeal from such an order would be barren of results." Owens v. Owens, 109 Va. 432, 434, 63 SE 990.

[§ 2511] b. Legatees, Distributees, and Creditors. Legatees or distributees,[53] or creditors of decedent,[54] when aggrieved by the order or decree rendered on the settlement of the representative's accounts, may appeal therefrom.

[§ 2512] c. Personal Representatives.[55] The right of a personal representative to appeal depends upon whether or not he is aggrieved by the judgment or decree.[56] He cannot appeal from a judgment which rejects a claim against the estate which he has not paid, or become personally liable to pay;[57] but where he has paid claims placed on his account, he has a direct interest in sustaining such payments and may appeal from a judgment adverse to their validity.[58] He may also appeal from a decree charging him, as he claims improperly, with funds as belonging to the estate,[59] or from an order modifying his report and ordering a distribution of the estate in a manner contended by him to be contrary to the will.[60]

The revocation of letters testamentary or of administration does not affect the right of the representative to appeal from an order settling his accounts.[61]

One who is coexecutor and legatee is in either capacity entitled to appeal from an order of the orphans' court passing a separate account of the other executor, in which the latter is allowed a large claim against the estate,[62] and a coexecutor who was also a residuary legatee, and who objected to the final account, has been held not deprived of his right to appeal from a judgment allowing the same, on the theory that he had participated in filing and procuring the allowance thereof.[63]

In what capacity appeal taken. In order that the representative may appeal in his representative capacity, the estate which he represents must be aggrieved by the order or decree appealed from, otherwise any appeal must be in his individual capacity.[64]

court it must, as a general rule, have been raised in the court below and an appropriate exception to the court's ruling thereon reserved.[66] It has been held, however, that in the final settlement of an estate the omission to make the personal representative of a deceased distributee a party may be taken advantage of on appeal, although no objection was made in the probate court,[67] and that, although an administrator makes no objection on the ground of defective notice before the clerk, he can do so on appeal to the superior court.[68] So also where appellant did not appear in the probate court, he may insist on the appeal on questions not raised or passed on in the probate court.[69] An exception to the final judgment approving an administrator's final report is not essential to the right to review it,[70] nor is it required that written objection be interposed to such report to preserve the right of review.[71] It has been held that as exceptions or objections could not be made before the orphans' court to the allowance of executor's commissions, which could not be paid prior to filing of the account, or to the allowance of proctor's fees made at court's settlement, such objections can be made for first time in an appellate court,[72] and that an administrator, who mistakenly accounted to the orphans' court for rents for decedent's realty, is not precluded from insisting, on appeal from an order of the orphans' court refusing to strike out exceptions filed to his accounting, upon his right to account in some tribunal whose decree will adequately protect him.[73]

after all the evidence has been taken, even though an untimely motion to dismiss the appeal had been made and denied.[78]

[§ 2515] 6. Requisites for Review. The giving of notice to the proper parties is as a general rule an essential step in perfecting the appeal,[79] although it has been held otherwise where the appeal was taken during the term at which the final order settling the account was made and the statute did not require such notice to be given.[80] The filing of an appeal bond, when review is sought by appeal, is generally held to be necessary,[81] although a personal representative who takes an appeal is sometimes exempted from the necessity of giving a bond.[82] It has been held that, where the appeal has been perfected in the circuit court, the appellants, having filed their exceptions in the probate court, as required, within the time provided by statute, may renew such exceptions or amend the exceptions already filed in the circuit court.[83]

[§ 2516] 7. Parties. It has been held that all persons interested in maintaining the judgment or order rendered upon the settlement of an administration account should be made parties to the appeal,[84] but it has also been asserted that only those who appeared in the proceeding or in some way made themselves parties of record are necessary parties to the appeal.[85] The personal representative is of course a necessary party.[86] Where the representative appeals as an individual from a judgment or order favorable to the estate but unfavorable to him, the estate should be made an appellee.[87]

for a bill of exceptions, case, or statement of facts,[90] and the necessity of bringing up evidence.[91] Where a partial transcript on appeal from the county court in a proceeding to settle an administrator's final account was filed in the district court within the statutory time, it was not error for the district court to allow a portion of the transcript in the same case which had been formerly filed in the district court to be attached thereto, and made a part thereof.[92] Where both the representative and the opponent appeal from the judgment rendered on opposition to the representative's account, and the representative files a transcript, it is not necessary that the opponent should also file a transcript.[93]

Amendment. Although the statute provides that the superior court on probate appeals may allow amendments to supply deficiencies or correct errors, where, on appeal from a decree allowing an administrator's account, appellant complained of the omission of statements of gain and loss on the inventory, the appeal could not be affected by the administrator filing an amended account containing the items with the superior court's permission, but without appellant's consent and without notice to him, appellant not being bound to apprehend the filing of the amended account and to look through the papers to find the items omitted from the original account.[94]

Settling case. A judge who prior to his appointment was a referee to determine the questions of fact on the judicial settlement on the account of an executor is disqualified from settling the case on review on appeal.[95]

[§ 2518] 9. Scope and Extent of Review—a. In General. Appeals from courts of probate jurisdiction are generally regulated by statutory provisions peculiar thereto[96] on which depends in a measure the extent to which orders and decrees made upon the settlements of personal representatives will be reviewed.[97] The investigation is usually restricted to matters as to which it is alleged that the trial court erred,[98] and where an account has been disterest or concern of the party who excepts to an administration account. Johnson v. Johnson, 2 Del. 273.

[c] Representation of minors by guardian.—Where the record shows that there are minor heirs, it must also show that they were represented at the settlement by a guardian or guardian ad litem. Clack v. Clack, 20 Ala. 461.

[d] The petition and acount filed by a personal representative in order to make a final settlement of his administration constitute a part of the record to be used on appeal, without being made so by a bill of exceptions. In re Isaacs, 30 Cal. 105.

[e] Inventory.—The filing of an account by a personal representative makes the inventory on which it is predicated a part of the record, and it is properly included in the transcript on appeal, although not offered in evidence. In re Osburn, 36 Or. 8, 58 P 521.

[f] Sufficient showing that inventory was filed.—Where the record on appeal from the final order settling the accounts of an administrator showed that an "inventory of the estate of decedent was presented to the court for examination," and that the administrator charged himself with his account current "to amount of inventory," it was sufficient to show that an inventory was filed. Hayes v. Hargus, 127 Ark. 22, 191 SW 408.

[g] Matters to be excluded.—The petition for letters, the order appointing the administrator, his bond, and the order of distribution, not being necessary parts of the administrator's report, are not a part of the record unless offered in evidence, and if included in the transcript on appeal will not be considered. [a] The higher court cannot determine the rights of the administrator or his attorney to compensation for services rendered after allowed, the appellate court is not required to pass on all the items thereof.[99]

[§ 2519] b. Presumptions in Support of Order or Decree. The order or decree of which a review is sought is as a general rule presumed to be right, in the absence of any affirmative showing in the record to the contrary, and every reasonable presumption will be indulged in favor of the correctness of the proceedings below.[1] Accordingly the burden rests on appellant to show that the ruling complained of was incorrect.[2]

Presumption of proper action in the future. On appeal from an order settling the semiannual account of an executor and revoking his letters, it will be presumed, in the absence of anything in the orders on the subject, that upon a final settlement of the estate the proper compensation will be allowed to the executor for his services.[3]

[§ 2520] c. Discretion of Lower Court. Determinations of the lower court as to matters which are properly within its discretion will not be disturbed on appeal, except for manifest abuse of such discretion.[4] This rule is most frequently applied with respect to such matters as the compensation of the representative,[5] allowances for the services of attorneys[6] or commissioners,[7] and costs.[8]

[§ 2521] d. Findings of Fact. The general rules as to reviewing findings of fact, by appellate courts,[9] apply on review of the proceedings of courts of probate jurisdiction with respect to the accounting of personal representatives,[10] with respect to such matters as review of the verdict of a jury[11] or of findings of the lower court.[12] Accordingly findings of fact by the lower court may be accepted as conclusive[13] if there is any evidence to support them,[14] and, where based on conflicting evidence, will not be disturbed.[15] The appellate court may, however, in a proper case review both the law and the facts.[16]

[§ 2522] e. Former Accounts. It has been held that former accounts, from the allowance of which no appeal was taken, and the matters passed upon in them, are not subject to revision and readjustment upon an appeal from the allowance of a later account in which the same questions were not before the probate court for consideration,[17] and that the annual settlements of an administrator cannot be corrected on appeal from an order of distribution.[18] But it has also been held that mistakes in annual settlements may be corrected on appeal from a final settlement.[19]

[§ 2523] 10. Consolidation of Appeals. In a proper case two appeals from a decree in an accounting proceeding may be consolidated.[20]

[§ 2525] 12. Determination and Disposition.[24] The appellate court may dismiss the appeal,[25] or affirm,[26] modify,[27] or reverse[28] the order or decree appealed from, or itself make such order or render such decree as the court of probate jurisdiction should have made or rendered.[29] In a proper case the proceedings may be remanded to the lower court.[30] Where the appellate court has, on an appeal from a decree allowing an executor's account, sustained an exception to the effect that the account is not a proper one to be allowed because the executor did not charge himself either with the amount of the inventory of the estate or with the amount

[a] When appeal not dismissed.—Where the active assets to be distributed under a provisional account filed by the dative testamentary executor were less than the minimum jurisdiction of the supreme court, and it appeared from the pleadings and the evidence in the principal suit, made a part of the record of the appeal, that the succession interest was large, and the issues were not confined to the provisional account, but embraced questions relating to large amounts of the succession, the appeal will not be dismissed. Dauphin's Succ., 113 La. 208, 36 S 941.

[b] No dismissal because appellant not aggrieved.—An appeal by a special administrator from an order settling his account, and requiring him to pay the balance in his hands to another, will not be dismissed on the ground that appellant is not a "party aggrieved," since a determination that he was not aggrieved would amount to a determination of the merits of the appeal. [a] Illustration.—Where, on appeal from a decree dismissing exceptions to an administratrix's account, the evidence shows that, after taking over his wife's business, decedent borrowed from claimant at an

of the balance of the last account rendered by him and directed a reversal, it should not determine other questions involved in other exceptions.[31] On appeal from an order denying a petition to compel an executor to account, the only question for decision is whether the petitioner has an interest in the estate, and it is not necessary to determine the exact nature of such interest.[32] Errors which are not prejudicial are not ground for reversal.[33]

[§ 2526] 13. Operation and Effect of Decree. The decree of the appellate court operates as a termination of the controversy involved in the appeal, and the account of the personal representative should be stated and a settlement made in accordance therewith.[34] A reversal on appeal of a decree finally settling the accounts of the representative renders such settlements inoperative,[35] while the dismissal of the appeal as to certain items of the account leaves the judgment of the court of probate jurisdiction as to such items, and binding upon the parties to the appeal.[36] A decree on appeal is not of course conclusive as to matters not passed on.[37]

[§ 2527] K. Private Accounting and Settlement. Where there are no creditors[38] or none whose debts are not paid,[39] legatees, distributees, and other persons entitled to the estate may enter into agreements among themselves,[40] or with the personal representative[41] as to the settlement of the estate, which will be sustained by the courts if they are alleged usurious interest, but does not disclose what, if any, usurious interest was paid, the record will be remitted to ascertain the amount of such usurious interest and credit the estate therewith. In re Litle, 244 Pa. 368, 90 A 733.

[b] Effect of issuance of remittitur.—When the remittitur has been duly and regularly issued, without inadvertence, the supreme court loses jurisdiction of the cause, and has no power to recall it, except in a case of mistake, or of fraud or imposition practiced upon the court. Levinson's Est., 108 Cal. 450, 41 P 483, 42 P 479.

[c] When unnecessary to remand.—On appeal from a decree of the probate court adjudging that it has no jurisdiction to hear and determine an administrator's accounts after a distribution by agreement of the intestate's estate, the superior court, acting as an appellate court of probate, on reversing such decree may settle the administration account as fully as could be done by the probate court without remanding it to that court. Mathews' App., 72 Conn. 555, 45 A 170.

[d] When not remanded.—In proceedings for the settlement of the account of executors, where only the question of testatrix's daughter's accountability for advancements, undisputed in amount, is involved, the case will not be remanded for new trial because of error. [a] Where the sole heir to a succession and all the creditors make an extrajudicial settlement of the succession and involve its affairs in confusion, the court will leave them where they have placed themselves and dismiss the suit for a settlement. Engelman v. Coco, 42 La. Ann. 923, 8 S 610.

[b] Presumption as to settlement.—Twenty years after the settlement of an estate in probate court pursuant to an agreement among the heirs, it will be presumed that the parties to the agreement appeared before the court, and that it was signed by a certain one of the heirs, or by some one authorized to sign for him and that all parties interested in the estate were parties to the agreement. [a] Intention to settle.—It must clearly appear from the acts of the parties that it was their intention to consider the estate settled and distributed, or to consider the personal representative discharged from further duty to them. Kells v. People's Trust Co., 82 App. Div. 548, 81 NYS 513.

[b] The superior court has jurisdiction to determine whether the legatees agreed to discharge the executor and to then divide the estate open, fair, and honest, and the parties of full age and under no disability. But such an agreement is of course not binding upon one who is not a party to it.[42] As the result of an agreement entered into by the personal representative and persons interested in the settlement of the estate, he may be relieved from his duty to render an account,[43] unless such a result would contravene some statutory provision.[44] As a general rule a settlement out of court between an executor or administrator and the legatees or distributees cannot afterward be opened except in equity on the ground of fraud or mistake,[45] although it has been held that such a settlement is not conclusive upon the parties but is merely evidence for the consideration of the judge of probate in deciding whether a further settlement shall be ordered and the accounts examined.[46] Relief may be afforded on equitable grounds.[47] So the validity of a written agreement set up by a personal representative as a release from his duty to account and settle may be inquired into,[48] and it will be of no avail if obtained by misrepresentation or fraud,[49] or entered into under a mistake of fact.[50] A receipt, although reciting a settlement in full, may be open to explanation and is not necessarily conclusive upon legatees or distributees in a suit brought by them to compel an accounting.[51] An administrator who is cited to make a final settlement cannot protect himself by setting up a written agreement entered into between himself and the executors and among themselves and to give effect to such agreement, since the title as between the beneficiaries depends on the agreement and not on decedent's will, except in so far as it is a part of the agreement. Wentworth v. Wentworth, 75 N. H. 547, 78 A 646.

[c] A bond given by a legatee to exonerate the executor is evidence of a settlement. Ives v. Sumner, 16 N. C. 338.

[d] A release for money due parties as residuary legatees does not release from liability for a specific legacy bequeathed in trust. Hanson v. Worthington, 12 Md. 418.

[e] Heirs bound by settlement.— Where the heirs and administratrix voluntarily and fairly settled the estate out of court, and ascertained the amount of the distributive share to which each heir was entitled, and one of the heirs was paid a greater part of his distributable share, the settlement was binding on him, although the other heirs left their shares in the hands of a third person as agent to keep and invest. Petry v. Petry, 142 Ky. 564, 134 SW 922.

[f] However, a private agreement made by some of the heirs at law, one of whom is administrator of the estate, which does not appear ever to have received the sanction of the probate court, cannot be considered a final settlement or a legal discharge of the administrator. Smilie v. Siler, 35 Ala. 88.

legatees before letters of administration were granted to him, which would change the whole course of administration and keep the estate in process of administration for fifteen years.[52]

[§ 2528] L. Costs and Expenses—1. In General. The costs and expenses of accounting and settlement and of proceedings or actions necessitated thereby should be borne by the general estate when incurred in the just interests of the whole estate,[53] and when in the interest of the estate an audit of the account of a personal representative appears necessary, the costs of such audit will be charged to the estate.[54] The granting of costs or allowances is a matter of discretion of the court rather than of right,[55] and the award should be made to the parties and not to their attorneys.[56] Costs or allowances on an accounting have no place whatever in the account, as they must first be fixed and allowed by the court.[57] In an action to surcharge an administrator's settlement, defendants other than the administrator, who sought to recover nothing, and made no costs, and against whom no recovery was sought, should not be taxed or pay any costs.[58]

[§ 2529] 2. Counsel Fees and Expenses of Settlement. An executor or administrator, who has properly performed the duties of his trust, is usually held to be entitled to his reasonable costs and expenses in connection with the settlement of his account,[59] including an allowance for fees of an at-

(2) If he employs counsel it is the duty of such counsel to present his account for payment before the final accounting, and for the representative to fix upon the amount which is reasonable to be paid and pay it on his own responsibility, and have such payment allowed on his final accounting. Osborne v. McAlpine, 4 Redf. Surr. (N. Y.) 1.

[f] Prerequisites to payment.—Where the referee had not filed his report, and his fees and the fees of the stenographer had not been taxed, the surrogate's court had no authority to order the executor to pay such fees, without bills or affidavits from the referee or stenographer as to the amounts claimed. pare his account personally, without any allowance for assistance.[67]

The amount allowed for counsel fees in accounting proceedings, in accordance with the general rule on the subject,[68] must be reasonable.[69] With respect to costs, the representative cannot be allowed more than the statutory amount.[70]

An allowance of counsel fees may be refused where the services for which the allowance was claimed were unnecessary in connection with the performance of the duties of the representative,[71] or were made necessary because of some fault on the part of the representative,[72] where the services were solely for the benefit of the representative,[73] where the representative is himself an attorney and there is no proof that he did not prepare his own account,[74] or where it appears that a payment previously made to the attorney, and for which the representative has received credit, was in full settlement for all services rendered and to be rendered by the attorney in connection with the estate.[75]

[§ 2530] 3. Allowance or Assessment to Contestants. Persons contesting the account of a representative may be taxed with a part or all of the costs of the proceeding where the decision is against them, if it appears that the contest was brought upon insufficient grounds;[76] but the costs of proceedings in which the contestant is successful, or which were brought in good faith and upon reasonable grounds, may be paid out of the estate.[77] Where a settlement of an account shows that the estate owes the representative more than he has been surcharged as the result of a contest, contestants

[a] Where the contestants were partially successful (1) in surcharging an account, the allowance of costs to the executor should be paid out of the estate, and not charged against them personally. Matter of Kreidler, 68 Misc. 412, 124 NYS 628, 7 Mills Surr. 559. (2) Where the heirs and distributees of an estate contested an administrator's right to commissions and credits, and were successful only in part, costs should be apportioned. Overman v. Lanier, 157 N. C. 544, 73 SE 192. (3) Plaintiffs will be adjudged to recover all costs they would be entitled to had they only sought to surcharge as to credits as to which they are successful, but are not entitled to costs.[78] A creditor calling an administrator to an account cannot recover costs unless he obtains a dividend,[79] and counsel fees have been denied where the real purpose of a settlement suit was to collect the claim of a particular creditor.[80] The court may in its discretion in a proper case divide the costs between the contestants.[81] The allowance to a party interested only in a particular fund will be paid out of that fund.[82] Costs will not be awarded to one who is not a party to the proceeding for accounting.[83]

Attorney's fees. In a proper case a contestant may be allowed even for attorney's fees,[84] but the allowance can be made only to the parties, and not directly to the attorneys.[85] Where there is no contest, the fees of counsel appearing for legatees must be paid by their clients, and not in whole or part made a charge on the funds of the estate.[86]

[§ 2531] 4. Personal Liability of Executor or Administrator. Costs and expenses of proceedings for accounting and settlement may be charged to the personal representative individually, when he has rendered it necessary that such costs and expenses should be incurred by his misconduct or negligence as to accounting or settling, or when on a contested settlement the finding is against him;[87] and he may also incur individual liability for the costs of a compulsory proceeding for accounting brought after undue delay on his part in accounting and settling.[88] The costs of an audit may be included in the costs which are charged to a personal representative individually.[89]

The representative should not be personally charged with any costs except such as have arisen from his wrongful acts.[90] He should not be charged where he has acted in good faith in the contest,[91] where he has been acquitted of dereliction of duty,[92] where the costs were made necessary by unsustained they will not recover costs made in unsuccessful efforts to charge debits or disallow credits. Evans v. McVey, 172 Ky. 1, 188 SW 1075.

exceptions to the account,[93] or even it has been held, where the opposition to his account was only partly sustained.[94]

An apportionment of costs may, under certain circumstances, be proper.[95]

An attachment for costs awarded against the personal representative is sometimes allowed.[96]

[§ 2532] 5. Costs of Appeal from Accounting. The allowance of costs to a personal representative on an appeal in proceedings for settlement of his account is sometimes held to be within the discretion of the court.[97] Representatives are personally liable for costs when they unsuccessfully appeal in their own interest from a settlement of their accounts,[98] or when an appeal results from their fault or misconduct,[99] and, conversely, on an appeal by the personal representative from an erroneous probate decree, made without any fault on his part, costs should be taxed against the estate.[1] Costs should not be taxed either for the representative or for the other party to the appeal when neither party was entirely in the right.[2] Where an executor holding funds of the testator in trust for a special purpose appeals from a decree relating to such funds, claiming no interest in them except as trustee, and the decree is affirmed in part and reversed in part, the questions being sufficiently important to authorize the appeal, costs should be taxed for the executor.[3] Counsel fees and expenses incurred in good faith in resisting appeals from orders auditing his account should be allowed the personal representative.[4] Where an administrator has appealed from an order commanding him to render an account, but after filing his bond he has abandoned the appeal, damages should not be granted for the frivolous appeal, as this would be to the detriment of the creditors and heirs of decedent, and not of the administrator.[5]

Allowing costs in advance of appeal. The court has no power to adjudge costs against the administrator which might accrue in the appellate courts, in anticipation of an appeal from its judgment.[6]

XVI. LIABILITY ON ADMINISTRATION BONDS[7]

[§ 2533] A. Nature and Extent of Liability—1. In General. The purpose of an administration bond is to secure creditors and next of kin from loss through the default or fraud of the administrator, and to furnish indemnity to the estate.[8] Where the bond is given with sureties, the principal and sureties are equally and primarily liable in case of a breach of its conditions.[9] The obligation of the sureties, however, rests solely in contract and they cannot be held liable contrary to or beyond the condition of the bond.[10] A bond which omits some condition required by statute, although binding in

"The liability of a surety in the bond of an administrator or executor is limited by the terms of its covenants, and cannot be extended by implication." Hooper v. Hooper, supra.

[a] The nature of the sureties' liability is fixed by the terms of the bond and not by the remedies which may be pursued for its enforcement. McDowell v. Jones, 58 Ala. 25.

[b] The liability of the sureties cannot be changed into another and different one from that expressed in the bond by any act of the other parties in interest. Webster v. Thompson, 55 Ga. 431; Weir v. Peo., 78 Ill. 192.

[c] Presumption as to condition—In the absence of contrary evidence it will be presumed that the bond of an executor was in the usual form equity on the principal[11] is not binding on the sureties as to the omitted condition;[12] but the omission does not affect the liability of the sureties as to the conditions properly included.[13] It has been held that, where the requisites of the bond are fixed by statute, conditions contained in it which the law does not require are void.[14] The sureties are in general jointly and severally liable in solido to those interested in the estate.[15] A recital in an administrator's bond that it was given pursuant to an order of court at a specified date is conclusive on the surety.[16]

Necessity for consideration. The bond must, to be binding, have a sufficient consideration.[17]

Bond taken contrary to testator's request. If the court ignores a request of the testator that security is required only for the payment of a particular legacy and takes a bond in the usual form, it will be binding accordingly and the sureties will be liable for the faithful discharge of all the duties of the executor.[18]

Fixing a devastavit on the administrator does not release him from the obligation of his official bond;[19] it only establishes his accountability more clearly and makes it personal as well as fiduciary.[20]

Bond standing in lieu of undertaking on appeal. It is sometimes provided by statute when a personal representative who has given an official bond appeals from a judgment or order made in proceedings had in the estate of which he is executor or administrator, his official bond stands in the place of an undertaking on appeal.[21]

[§ 2534] 2. Liability as Affected by Sufficiency of Assets. Under the usual tenor of an administration bond, the principal and his sureties are only bound to pay creditors, legatees, or heirs, according to assets which come to hand and the resources which arise in the course of an honest, prudent, and well advised administration.[22] But the bond to pay all debts and legacies sometimes given by an executor who is the residuary legatee[23] renders the executor and his sureties absolutely liable for such payment to the extent of the penalty, regardless of the amount or value of the estate.[24]

[§ 2535] 3. Effect of Statutory Penalty. The usual effect of a statutory penalty is to add to the legal liability of the executor or administrator for maladministration, and not to exclude indemnity by action on the bond itself.[25]

[§ 2536] 4. Effect of Irregular or Invalid Issuance of Letters. The fact that the issuance of the letters of administration was irregular or invalid does not as a rule affect the liability of either principal or sureties on the administration bond.[26] In such a case a bond may be upheld as a common-law bond,[27] and the sureties are estopped to question the regularity of the letters.[28]

[§ 2537] 5. Execution Induced by Fraud or Misrepresentation. The liability of the sureties on an administration bond is not affected by the fact that they were induced to sign the bond through the fraud or misrepresentation of the principal, of conditioned "for the faithful discharge by him of the duties of his trust." Reherd v. Long, 77 Va. 839.

[d] A bond conditioned to "obey all orders of the surrogate" touching the administration of the estate is more than a mere bond of indemnity and a right of action accrues against the sureties immediately on the refusal of the principal to comply with such an order. Baggott v. Boulger, 9 N. Y. Super. 160.

[e] Where new or additional duties are required of a public administrator by a statute passed after the execution of his bond the sureties are not liable for the performance of such new duties. State v. Cheaney, 52 Mo. A. 258.

[f] The sureties are under no obligation to render an account and before they can be held liable on their bond the liability of the principal must first be ascertained and established. Cadwallader v. Longley, 1 Disn. 497, 12 Oh. Dec. (Reprint) 756.

which the beneficiaries of the estate in whose interest the liability is sought to be enforced are innocent;[29] but they will not be liable as to any beneficiary who participated in the fraud.[30]

[§ 2538] 6. Bonds of Corepresentatives. The generally accepted view is that, where coexecutors or coadministrators unite in giving the same bond, they are jointly and severally liable, not only each as principal for his own acts, but also each as surety for the acts of his corepresentative,[31] unless the bond itself shows that they did not intend to become so bound;[32] but they are principals as to the joint sureties, and therefore they are bound to protect the sureties from the consequences of each other's acts.[33] In some states the rule is that, where corepresentatives execute a joint bond it is in effect the same as though each had given a separate bond with the same sureties, and they are jointly liable only for joint acts, neither being a surety for the separate acts of the other.[34] Where corepresentatives give separate bonds, they are separately and not jointly liable,[35] and the same rule applies to the sureties on such bonds[36] as between whom there is no right of contribution.[37]

Action by executor on bond. It has been held that, where two executors give a joint and several bond, an action may be had thereon against one of them and the sureties for the benefit of the other, who is also a legatee.[38]

[§ 2539] 7. Successive or Additional Bonds. Where an executor or administrator is required to give a new or additional bond, the new bond ordinarily relates back and the sureties thereon become liable for breaches of condition prior to its execution,[39] the two sets of sureties being considered as parties to a common undertaking with reciprocal rights of contribution,[40] unless of course the giving of the new bond has had the effect of discharging

[a] Proportion of contribution.—Where new bonds are given by an administrator after he has previously given bond, the proportion of contribution between the sureties is determined by the penalties of the several bonds. Central Banking, etc., Co. v. U. S. Fidelity, etc., Co., 73 W. Va. 197, 80 SE 121, 51 LRANS 797.

the sureties on the former bond.[41] It has been held, however, that as between the two sets of sureties those on the second bond are primarily liable,[42] that the sureties on the second bond are not liable until the remedy on the first bond has been exhausted,[43] and also that the sureties on the first bond are primarily liable for a devastavit committed before the execution of the second bond.[44]

Where an additional bond is given specially for the sale of real estate, it has been held that the liability on the second bond is subsidiary to the original and that no action can be maintained thereon until the penalty of the original bond is exhausted and that securities on the original bond are not entitled to contribution;[45] but it has also been asserted that the two sets of sureties assume a common burden with mutual rights of contribution.[46]

[§ 2540] 8. Public Officer's Bond.[47] The general bond of a public administrator renders the sureties thereon responsible for the faithful discharge of his duties in administering each and all of the estates which may be committed to him as public administrator;[48] and when a sheriff or other public officer acts ex officio as a public administrator, the sureties on his official bond are liable for all of his acts as administrator.[49] This is true even where a special administration bond has been required;[50] and the liability continues until the officer has been discharged as administrator, notwithstanding the fact that his original term of office has expired.[51]

Unauthorized appointment. The sureties on the bond of a county administrator are not liable for acts or defaults committed by him under an appointment as temporary administrator, for which appointment there is no authority by law.[52]

Where a public administrator succeeds himself in office and gives a new bond, the sureties thereon are not, it has been held, liable for his acts as administrator of an estate committed to his charge during his former term;[53] but there is also authority for the view that the second bond covers liability for a misappropriation of funds occurring during its life, although the funds came into the hands of the public administrator during the life of his previous bond.[54]

Administration in individual capacity. When administration does not devolve upon the officer by virtue of his office, but is granted to him as an individual, the sureties on his official bond are not liable for his acts or defaults as such administrator.[55]

[§ 2541] 9. Estoppel. Sureties who voluntarily sign an administration bond and on the faith of whose security persons interested in the estate have relied and acted will be estopped to set up any defect or irregularity in the proceedings as a defense to their liability,[56] and they will also be estopped as against such persons from setting up any private agreement between themselves and the principal limiting or qualifying the nature of their liability.[57] So also where one's name has been signed as surety without his authority and after being informed of the fact he does not object, he cannot, after the administrator has committed waste, deny his liability.[58] But if all named as sureties in the bond do not sign the others may retract, although they must do so before the bond has been delivered and the judge, creditors, and administrator have acted on it.[59]

Beneficiaries and creditors. A beneficiary or creditor of the estate may by his conduct estop himself from enforcing any liability against the sureties;[60] but when no act or omission on the part of the sureties is induced by the failure of the legatees to object to the failure of an executrix to include certain property in the inventory the legatees are not estopped to claim that the property omitted was a part of the estate.[61]

[§ 2542] 10. Indemnity to Sureties. It is sometimes provided by statute that, where a surety on an administration bond is in danger of loss on account of his suretyship, the principal may be required to furnish counter security for his protection,[62] and in case such security is not furnished the court may remove the executor or administrator

[c] Additional security may, if necessary, be demanded by sureties who have once obtained counter security, and the counter security may from office,[63] or order the property delivered up to the surety.[64] In the absence of such provision an executor or administrator cannot be required to furnish counter security unless it has been contracted for,[65] although he may do so voluntarily,[66] in which case, however, the indemnity bond affords no greater protection than its conditions import.[67]

Where more than one bond has been given by the representative, the benefit of counter security taken by the sureties on one of the bonds operates for the benefit of the other sureties also, in the absence of an express agreement to the contrary.[68]

[§ 2543] B. Property Covered—1. In General. The sureties on the bond of an executor or administrator are responsible only for what might properly come into his hands as assets,[69] which as a general rule includes only such assets as have actually come into his possession or which he could have collected by the exercise of due diligence.[70] But for all property collected and not accounted for, or not collected by reason of want of due diligence, the bond is liable;[71] and this liability is not affected by the fact that assets to the amount of the penalty of the bond have been accounted for.[72]

[§ 2544] 2. Property Received or Converted before Execution of Bond. As the bond covers the duty to make a just and proper final accounting as to all property received and acts done during the entire course of administration,[73] the general rule is that the sureties are liable for assets of the estate which their principal received before as well as after the execution of the bond, in case of the principal's conversion or maladministration in respect of such assets or failure to render due account thereof.[74] Nevertheless, it has been held that the surety cannot be held liable for the acts of his principal prior to the execution of the bond.[75]

[§ 2545] 3. Debts of Representative to Estate. A debt due to the estate from an executor or administrator becomes assets of the estate[76] and is covered by the administration bond.[77] In some jurisdictions it is held that the sureties are liable for the payment of the debt without regard to the principal's solvency or ability to pay,[78] but the more general view is that the liability of the sureties is the same as with regard to the debts of other persons,[79] and that they are not liable where the executor or administrator was at the time of his appointment and continued to be, throughout the entire time of administration, insolvent and unable to pay,[80] even though he has charged the debt in his account as available assets.[81] If, however, the executor or administrator, while solvent, fails to pay, the sureties will be liable in case he subsequently becomes insolvent,[82] and if, during the administration, the representative was able to pay part of the debt and failed to do so, the sureties are liable to that extent.[83] So also, where the representative was able to pay the debt but failed to do so, the sureties are responsible, notwithstanding he was technically insolvent by reason of his property being not subject to legal process.[84]

[a] Property held by a decedent in trust, or in which he had merely a life interest, is not assets of the estate, and no action of the executor as to such property coming into his hands will render him or his sureties liable upon his administration bond. Pawtucket Prob. Ct. v. Williams, 30 R. I. 144, 73 A 382, 19 AnnCas 554 [pet to show cause and motion for rearg den 74 A 177].

[b] Property received by the representative by virtue of his appointment, although it cannot be reckoned cluded in the representative's report as assets.[90] But there is also authority for the view that the bond covers property which the representative has received and dealt with as assets, although not properly such.[91]

[§ 2548] 6. Foreign Assets. The liability of the sureties on an executor's or administrator's bond is limited to such assets as rightfully come or ought to have come into his hands in the state of his appointment.[92] Therefore, while as to all assets which he has a right to receive and does receive, although coming from a foreign jurisdiction, the sureties on the bond will be liable,[93] they will not be liable for such assets which he receives without lawful authority.[94]

[§ 2549] 7. Equitable Assets.[95] It has been asserted that as the obligation imposed by the bond of an executor or administrator is altogether legal, the sureties cannot be liable for any breach other than that of the legal duties embraced by the condition of the bond, and that hence the sureties are not liable for equitable assets coming into the hands of the representative;[96] but this rule has been practically abrogated by statutes requiring administration bonds to embrace all the duties and powers of the representative,[97] and it is further to be noted that as, at least in the United States, the distinction between legal and equitable assets is rarely enforced;[98] the doctrine under consideration has but little practical importance.

[§ 2550] 8. Proceeds of Sale of Realty—a. Under Order of Court. The liability of sureties on the general bond of an executor or administrator for the proceeds of the sale of real estate that have come into his hands is governed by the conditions of the bond.[99] In some jurisdictions it is held that the ordinary conditions cover the proper administration of such proceeds,[1] and that if a special bond is required it is to be regarded merely as additional security.[2] In others the sureties on the general bond are not liable,[3] and a special bond must be given to cover such proceeds as a distinct liability.[4]

[§ 2551] b. Under Testamentary Authority. The liability of sureties for the proper administration of the proceeds of real estate, sold by an executor or administrator with the will annexed under a power or direction in the will, is determined largely by the conditions of the bond and the law in force at the time of its execution.[5] There is, however, a conflict of authority on this subject not reconcilable by reason of the differences in the form of the bonds considered in the several cases.[6] In some jurisdictions it is held that the sureties on the original bond will be liable,[7] but in others it is held that they are not liable and that whenever real estate is to be sold by the personal representative a new bond should be given.[8] A distinction has been made between an express direction and a discretionary power to sell, it being held that the sureties on the general bond are liable where there is an express direction, but now where there is merely a discretionary power.[9]

[§ 2552] 9. Money Paid to Prevent Sale of Realty. Money paid by devisees to prevent a sale of real estate for the payment of debts is assets for which the sureties on the bond are liable.[10]

[§ 2553] 10. Money Received on Appropriation of Property for Public Use. Where real estate which an administrator has levied on to satisfy a debt due the estate is taken for public use after the time for redemption by the judgment debtor has expired, the sureties are liable for the money received therefor by the administrator.[11]

[§ 2554] 11. Proceeds of Insurance. The proceeds of insurance on the life of decedent are not ordinarily assets of the estate or properly receivable by the representative in his representative capacity,[12] and if such proceeds are collected by him the sureties on his bond are not liable therefor.[13] The sureties are liable, however, where the representative is charged with the duty of collecting such proceeds and paying them over to the persons entitled thereto, although such proceeds are by statute exempt from the payment of debts,[14] and the same has been held to be true where the policy is payable to the personal representative of the insured, who has collected the proceeds in his representative capacity.[15] But it has also been held that as a life insurance policy payable to the executors, administrators, or assigns of a decedent is in law payable to his surviving widow and children, the sureties on the bond of the administratrix are not liable for the application of the insurance actually collected by her.[16] Sureties on the bond are not liable for the proceeds of fire insurance on buildings of the estate.[17]

[§ 2555] 12. Allowance to Decedent's Family. The liability of the sureties on an administration bond for the amount of statutory exemptions in favor of the family of the decedent depends on the duties imposed by the statute on the executor or administrator with reference to the exemptions.[18] Where an allowance is made directly to the family, and provision is made for setting it apart without the intervention of the personal representative, who is charged with no duty in respect to it except to pay over or deliver it, if it is in his hands, his sureties are not liable if he fails to make such payment or delivery, or if he converts to his own use the money or property so set apart, although he may be liable personally.[19] But where the statute requires the executor or administrator to set aside and pay over or deliver the amount of money or the specific articles allowed, the sureties on his bond are liable for the nonperformance of such duty.[20]

[§ 2556] 13. Income, Interest, Rents, and Profits. The sureties on an administration bond are liable, like the principal, for the income and profits which may accrue during the period of administration upon property for which he becomes responsible.[21]

Interest on assets, in the sense of accruing profit or income, and interest chargeable to the executor or administrator for use or misuse of the property in his hands, are usually covered by the administration bond, both as to principal and sureties.[22]

As to rents and profits from real estate, if the executor or administrator is made accountable therefor by statute, the sureties on the bond will be liable,[23] although this liability is not expressly set out in the bond;[24] and when real estate is devised to executors in trust to sell and invest the proceeds the sureties on the bond are liable for any rents

[a] The word "rents" in the bond required by the Kentucky statute applies to only such rents as decedent's death passed to his personal representative and not to his heirs, and does not render the sureties liable for rents collected under a lease made by an administrator after the decedent's death. Wilson v. Unselt, 12 Bush (Ky.) 215.

[b] If the executor or administrator is removed from office, the sureties on the bond will not be liable for rents subsequently collected by him. Brooks v. Jackson, 125 Mass. 307.

collected from such property.[25] But in the absence of any such statutory or testamentary provision the rule in most jurisdictions is that, although the executor or administrator might be held personally liable to the heirs as trustee,[26] the sureties on his bond will not be liable,[27] and that whenever it becomes necessary for an executor or administrator to collect or receive the rents from real estate a new bond must be given.[28] There is, however, authority for the view that if the representative does in fact receive the rents and profits of realty, his bond stands as security therefor.[29]

[§ 2557] 14. Property Held in Capacity Other than as Executor or Administrator[30]—a. In General. As a rule the official bond of the executor or administrator is not construed to cover his responsibility with respect to property held by him in some other and distinct capacity.[31] Where the representative also occupies some other character with regard to the estate, such as guardian or trustee, it will be presumed that the property in his hands is held in that capacity in which he ought to hold it.[32]

[§ 2558] b. As Guardian. The sureties on the bond of an executor or administrator are not liable for property held by him in the capacity of guardian of one of the heirs or distributees of the estate.[33] Upon the termination of the representative's duties as executor or administrator the property is transferred by operation of law into his hands as guardian and the sureties on the former bond are released from further liability,[34] but if the wards become of age and entitled to distribution before the amount for distribution is ascertained the administrator becomes indebted to them and not to himself as guardian, and the sureties on the administration bond are liable.[35] Where a guardian becomes the administrator of the estate of a deceased ward, the sureties on the administration bond become liable for the proper administration of all assets then on hand which he formerly held as guardian.[36]

[§ 2559] c. As Trustee. Where the same person is both executor and trustee under a will the sureties on his bond as executor are not liable for property held by him in the capacity of trustee,[37]

[a] Illustration.—Where the testator held certain bonds in trust to collect and pay over the income to the beneficiaries, and on his death his executor took possession of the trust funds, although the will did not purport to make any disposition of them, and the beneficiaries acquiesced in this act of the executor and did not call on him to account until many years after the final settlement of his accounts as executor, the executor in taking posses-

unless they are made so by express statute.[38] It has been held, however, that where an executor, who is also named as trustee in the will, assumes the duties of trustee in the capacity of executor, his sureties cannot question the capacity in which he was acting,[39] and that if the executor fails to qualify as trustee, and deals with the trust estate as executor, the sureties on his administration bond are responsible for his acts.[40]

[§ 2560] d. As Devisee Charged with Payment of Legacy. Where an executor is also a devisee who takes the devise charged with the payment of a legacy, he is liable for such payment as devisee only, and his sureties are not liable.[41]

[§ 2561] e. As Surviving Partner. Where a surviving partner is appointed executor or administrator of his deceased copartner, partnership funds coming into his hands are presumed to be in the capacity of surviving partner, for which the sureties on his bond as executor or administrator will not be liable.[42] But by becoming executor or administrator he assumes the responsibility of collecting what is due by him to the estate as surviving partner,[43] and the sureties on his bond are liable for his failure to do so after such amount is ascertained,[44] or if he sells property of the estate for the payment of partnership debts while having partnership funds in his possession.[45] So also after the partnership affairs are wound up the interest of decedent is in the hands of his personal representative as such, and the bond must answer for his subsequent dealings therewith.[46]

[§ 2562] C. Functions and Acts Covered. The functions and acts covered by an administration bond and for which the sureties are liable embrace generally all the duties which the executor or administrator is called on to discharge in the course of the administration,[47] the rule being that whenever a representative does what the law prohibits or fails to exercise reasonable care and diligence in the endeavor to do what the law requires his bond stands as security for any damage resulting from such act or omission.[48] But the bond does not stand as security for acts which do not come within the scope of the official powers and duties of the executor or administrator,[49] breaches of merely personal sion of the trust funds acted as trustee and not[3] as executor, and therefore the sureties on his bond were not liable for the misappropriation by him of such funds. Quinby v. Walker, 14 Oh. St. 193.

[b] The sureties of an administrator with the will annexed are not liable for the misapplication of funds turned over to him as trustee by order of the probate court. Barker v. Stanford, 53 Cal. 451; In re Quimby, 84 N. J. Eq. 1, 92 A 56.

[c] Where a will directs an executor to invest the personal estate and apply the income to certain purposes, there is not such a trust superadded to his duties as executor as to absolve the surety on his bond as executor from liability. Hall v. Cushing, 9 Pick. (Mass.) 395.

duties [50] or contracts,[51] or acts done with respect to the property of the estate in some other and distinct capacity,[52] unless the bond by its terms covers all the duties imposed by the will, in which event the sureties are liable for the exercise of testamentary trusts.[53] The bond does not ordinarily secure the payment of debts contracted by the executor or administrator in the settlement of the estate;[54] nor are the sureties ordinarily liable for the payment of costs awarded against the principal,[55] although it has been held that, where the bond is conditioned to obey all orders of the court touching the administration of the estate, and the court has jurisdiction to award costs either against the estate or against the representative, an order for the payment of costs is within the condition of the bond,[56] and that a bond to pay all debts and legacies of the testator, given by an executor who is sole legatee, must respond to costs awarded out of the estate to contestants of the will.[57]

C. 397. (2) Where property was devised to executors, to hold as trustees for certain purposes, and on approval of the final account of the executors the court ordered them to hold the property in trust and administer it in accordance with the will, and the executors undertook to administer the trust without qualifying as testamentary trustees as required by statute, they continued to hold the property as executors and the sureties on their administration bonds were liable for a loss thereof. [b] Management of decedent's business.—(1) Where a testator by his will directs that the executors continue his business for a certain period for the benefit of the estate, they act in so doing not as executors but as trustees, and the sureties on the bond are not liable for any losses. Carter v. Young, 9 Lea (Tenn.) 210. (2) But if he permits them to conduct it for their own benefit, the fund invested to be returned and administered, it is a loan to them and remains a part of the estate for the return and proper administration of which the sureties are liable. the liability of the principal is extinguished by operation of law.[61] An alteration in the bond after its execution increasing the penal sum, made by the probate judge with the consent of the principal but without the knowledge of the sureties, releases the latter from liability thereon.[62] Whether the imposition of new or additional duties on a public administrator by a statute passed after the execution of his bond will release the sureties from their original liability will depend upon whether the performance of his original duties is materialy interfered with,[63] but in any case the sureties have no liability with respect to the new duties imposed.[64] The fact that upon the filing of his account the probate court discharged an administrator from all further liability on his bond as such administrator does not release him or his surety from liability for wrongfully or illegally distributing any part of the personal estate.[65] A formal release of a surety by one of the persons beneficially interested in the estate does not relieve such surety of his obligation to such person where it is shown to have been obtained by fraud and undue influence.[66]

[§ 2564] 2. Settlement and Discharge of Principal. The final settlement of the accounts of an executor or administrator and his discharge ordinarily terminate the liability on the bond;[67] it has the force and effect of a judgment,[68] and precludes any action on the bond unless impeached and set aside in an appropriate proceeding.[69] An action on the bond is not, however, barred by a settlement and discharge which was procured by fraud;[70] and it has been held that the fact that an account purporting to be a final account has been settled in the probate court is no bar to an action on the bond for assets converted by the executor to his own use and not accounted for.[71] Where one of two administrators resigns, and the other is appointed sole administrator and gives a new bond, the sureties on the former bond which had been given jointly by both administrators are released.[72]

Settlement while suit pending. Where an administrator makes a settlement of his account while a suit by a creditor is pending against him, the debt in suit not being taken into account, such premature settlement and discharge will not relieve the sureties from liability on the bond.[73]

A conditional discharge of the representative on the final accounting does not release the sureties from liability until the conditions have been complied with.[74]

Where a representative is directed to retain certain funds to be paid over at a future date and he retains them in his representative capacity, the sureties are not discharged from their liability until the amount is finally paid over as directed.[75]

An allowance of a certain sum "retained to pay legacies," in the first account of an administrator is not an absolute credit or discharge of the legacies, but an admission of funds for their payment,[76] and an allowance in his second account "for sundry payments made, as stated in the last account," although with the consent of the legatees, does not discharge the obligation of the administrator's bond to pay the legacies according to the will.[77]

[§ 2565] 3. Death of Principal or Surety. The death of an executor or administrator does not discharge his sureties from liability for his acts or defaults concerning the estate in his lifetime;[78] and it has been held that their liability extends even to the acts or defaults of the personal representative of the deceased executor or administrator with regard to the original estate,[79] although this has been denied.[80] The liability of a surety is not discharged by his own death but extends to defaults of the principal subsequently committed.[81]

Where corepresentatives have given a joint bond, the death of one of them does not release the sureties, but they remain responsible for the proper performance by the surviving representative of his duties in the administration of the estate.[82]

[§ 2566] 4. Release of Cosurety. Under a statute declaring that a release of one joint debtor does not extinguish the obligation of any of the others, an order releasing a surety on an administrator's bond, on application of the heirs at law, does not release a cosurety, although the statute authorizes the release of a surety only on his own application.[83] It has been held that a release by one of the beneficiaries of one of the joint and several securities on the bond of the executor releases the other sureties only to the extent to which the released surety would have been liable upon the ultimate ascertainment of the sum to be paid by the solvent and responsible sureties to the beneficiary.[84]

[§ 2567] 5. Revocation of Letters; Resignation or Removal of Principal. Where the letters of an executor or administrator are revoked or he is removed or resigns, the sureties are ordinarily released from liability as to the subsequent administration,[85] but they remain liable for all previous acts or defaults of the principal.[86]

Final settlement of a representative's account, on his resignation, like any other final settlement,[87] ends all liability on the bond,[88] but a settlement made by the representative at the time of his resignation, which does not close the business of the estate in his hands is not a final settlement which will have this result.[89]

If the representative is removed pending the settlement of his accounts, the probate court may still proceed with the settlement and hold his sureties liable for his failure to pay a decree thereafter entered.[90]

Failure to pay over to successor. Where an administrator who has resigned or been removed fails to pay over to his successor the funds of the estate in his hands, his bond is liable at the suit of the successor,[91] but not at the suit of a creditor.[92]

Where an order dismissing an administrator is rescinded and the administrator reinstated, the sureties continue bound.[93]

Coexecutors or coadministrators. Where the letters of one coexecutor or coadministrator are revoked, or one resigns and the sole administration devolves upon the other, the sureties on the joint bond continue liable for the subsequent acts of the other;[94] but where one coadministrator resigns and accounts to the other and is discharged and the other is reappointed under a new bond the sureties on the joint bond are discharged.[95]

A public administrator, although he resigns his office, continues the representative of estates committed to his hands before his resignation and the sureties on his bond remain liable for the discharge of his duties as to such estates.[96]

Reappointment of principal. The sureties of an administrator, who have been released by the resignation or removal of their principal, do not again become liable where he is reappointed and gives a new and different bond,[97] although it has been held that under such circumstances, if a balance is ascertained against the representative on the first administration, distributees may at their election receive against the sureties on either the first or second bond.[98]

[§ 2568] 6. Expiration of Term of Office or Time Limited for Administration. Where the time for completing administration is expressly limited by statute,[99] the sureties are released from liability at the expiration of such period,[1] although if an executor sells property for notes not maturing until after the expiration of his appointment and fails to account for them, his sureties will be liable.[2]

Where special or temporary administration is granted, sureties on the administration bond are released when the reason of the grant ceases to exist.[3]

If a bond is conditioned to administer the estate according to the will, a further condition in the bond that it shall be administered within a certain time will not be construed as a release from liability as to acts which it appears from the face of the will cannot be so performed.[4]

State, 68 Miss. 680, 10 S 52, 24 AmSR 297.

[a] Misapplication of estate of original representative.—The sureties of an executor or administrator are not chargeable with a misapplication by his representative of the assets of his estate. Williams v. State, 68 Miss. 680, 10 S 52, 24 AmSR 297.

[b] Failure to pay balance due estate.—The failure of the personal representative of a deceased executor to pay over to the administrator de bonis non of the original testator's estate a balance decreed by the probate court to be due to such estate from the executor constitutes a breach of the executor's bond for which the sureties are liable. Cook v. Titcomb, 115 Me. 38, 41, 97 A 133 (there is no merit in a contention "that there was not, and could not be, any breach of the bond after the death of the executor, for which the sureties on his official bond can be held liable").

The authority of a public administrator as to unfinished business in his official custody continues after the expiration of his term of office[5] and the sureties on his bond remain liable.[6]

[§ 2569] 7. Giving New Bond.[7] Whether the giving of a new bond will operate to discharge the sureties on a former bond is governed in some cases by the purpose of the new bond,[8] and in others by express statutory provisions.[9] It is often provided that the sureties on the former bond shall be discharged from any liability accruing after the giving of the new bond,[10] but liabilities already incurred are not affected.[11] As a rule, however, when not otherwise provided, a new or additional bond is merely cumulative and does not release the sureties on the first bond,[12] although the filing of the new bond is regarded as constituting an assent to an order of the court discharging the sureties on the old bond.[13] If the new bond is void, the sureties on the old bond are not released, although the new bond was intended as a substitute therefor.[14]

[§ 2570] 8. Giving Special Obligation for Payment of Distributive Share. Where an executor or administrator under an agreement with a distributee gives the latter a special bond[15] or note[16] for the payment of his distributive share, the sureties on the original bond are discharged as to this amount.

[§ 2571] 9. Retention of Property by Principal in Another Capacity. As previously stated the bond of an executor or administrator does not cover property held or acts done by him in some other and distinct capacity.[17] It follows that, where property of the estate is transferred to, and retained by, the representative in another capacity, the sureties on the administration bond are released from further liability with respect thereto.[18] They will not be released, however, unless a transfer has been made and a new liability incurred.[19] It is in some cases difficult to say when the transfer of possession from one capacity to another takes place;[20] but it is well settled that, where property has been received in one capacity, the change, in order to shift the responsibility of the sureties, must be evidenced by some overt act or express election to hold the property in the other capacity.[21] A transfer by operation of law may be presumed on the termination of the duties of the executor or administrator as such;[22] but the presumption is subject to rebuttal.[23]

Gilmer v. Baker, 24 W. Va. 72.

[b] Where approval of court necessary.—Where a will gave the executor no express power to sell, nor any direction of a personal nature, but merely a general direction to set apart and safely invest such sum as would produce certain annuities, and he could only have exercised power and discretion under the court's supervision, and with the court's approval, the executor as such, or one subsequently appointed as administrator with the will annexed, was charged in his official capacity, and not as a personal trustee, to preserve the fund set apart to produce the annuities; and the sureties on the bond of an administrator, appointed after the refusal of the executor named to serve, were liable for such administrator's defalcation with respect thereto. [a] Agreement for improper use of funds.—A secret agreement between the distributees and the administrator that the latter may use the funds of the estate in his private business will discharge the sureties from all liability to the distributees. Rutter v. Hall, 31 Ill. A. 647.

[b] Extending time to pay debts.—(1) The doctrine that a surety is released by an extension of time without his consent to the principal debtor does not apply so as to release the sureties of an administrator to whom a creditor of the estate gives time for the payment of his claim. Gillet v. Rachal, 9 Rob. (La.) 276. (2) Where an administrator de bonis non recovered a judgment on the bond of the first administrator and levied execution on the property of the principal and sureties who were then solvent, and afterward he withdrew the execution and took a deed of trust from the principal to secure the amount of the judgment, and the property covered by the deed of trust depreciated in value, and the principal and all the sureties except defendant became insolvent, the rule that a surety is released by extending the time of the payment of the debt without the consent of the surety was applicable and operated to release defendant. West v. Brison, 99 Mo. 684, 13 SW 95.

[c] Taking executor's note for legacy after expiration of time for payment.—A surety on the bond of an executor, who is also a residuary legatee, is released by the act of a legatee who, without the surety's assent or procurement, accepts the executor's note for the amount of the legacy after the time limited by the will for paying it has expired. Durfee v. Abbott, 50 Mich. 479, 15 NW 559.

[d] The surety is not released by a private agreement between the heirs, regulating the mode of partition of the estate and authorizing the curator to pay certain claims and verbal authority from the heirs to the curator to settle the affairs of the estate out of court. Perkins v. Cenas, 15 La. Ann. 60.

[e] Coöperation of heirs with representative.—The fact that the representative and the heirs agreed to resist the payment of certain claims and that the administrator with their consent held the assets pending the litigation and afterward wasted them and became insolvent will not discharge the sureties, since the heirs had a right to coöperate with the administrator in resisting the claims of creditors by all lawful means. McMahon v. Paris, 87 Ga. 660, 13 SE 572.

bility to such beneficiary;[25] and where the person injured by the default of the representative has the means of satisfying the claim in his hands, and voluntarily surrenders it, he thereby discharges the sureties to the extent of such means.[26] Laches in proceedings against the principal may also release the sureties.[27] A surety on an administrator's additional bond is not relieved from liability because of failure on the part of the beneficiaries promptly to notify him of their belief of the administrator's misconduct,[28] nor will failure of the next of kin to ascertain that an estate was being misappropriated by the first administrator defeat a suit on his bond by a second administrator.[29] Neither is the surety on an executor's bond discharged so far as a legatee is concerned by a suit brought against the legatee by a creditor, the appointment of a receiver, and an order directing the executor to pay the amount of the legacy to the receiver, where only a small portion of the legacy was paid and the receiver discharged.[30] An estoppel in pais does not arise in favor of the sureties on an administrator's bond when it appears that the heirs at law, after citing him to account for the proceeds of land sold by him at public sale, recovered the land in an action of ejectment brought against the purchaser at the sale, but subsequently lost possession thereof when it was subjected to the demands of a mortgage creditor of such purchaser, as against whom they were estopped from attacking the validity of the administrator's sale, because of their prior election to claim the proceeds of the land.[31] A release given by the beneficiaries to a surety, in order to be upheld, must be shown to be fair and reasonable, because the sureties stand in the same fiduciary relation to the beneficiaries as the principal does.[32]

[§ 2573] 11. Discharge by Order of Court[33]— a. Power to Grant Discharge. The courts have been very generally invested, by statute, with power, in certain cases, to release the sureties on the bond of an executor or administrator from further liability,[34] the principal being required to furnish new security,[35] under penalty of having his letters revoked on failure to do so.[36] But the court cannot ordinarily release the sureties from any liabilities already incurred;[37] nor can it grant a valid release without making provision for the protection of the estate.[38] It is accordingly held that an order discharging the sureties is ineffectual until a sufficient new bond is given.[39] In the absence of statute the court is without authority to discharge a surety.[40]

The sureties on the bond of a public administrator may, it has been held, be discharged under a statute providing for the discharge of the sureties on the "bond given by any officer,"[41] but it has also been held that a county administrator is not a public officer within the purport of a statute relating to the discharge of the sureties on the bond of any "public officer."[42]

[a] This rule applies where judgment was erroneously taken against the principal as an individual when he was solvent, and he became insolvent before the judgment was amended; but, in order that this may release the sureties, it must appear that, at the time the judgment was rendered, there were assets of the estate in the hands of the principal as administrator. It will not do to show that there was sufficient property in the hands of the heirs and distributees to whom it had been turned over in the distribution; for the judgment, even if it had been rendered correctly, would only have bound the property of the intestate in the hands of the administrators to be administered. obtaining a discharge from liability as surety by order of court are regulated by statutes,[43] the requirements of which must be complied with.[44] The facts necessary to confer jurisdiction should appear of record.[45] Where the probate judge accepts the resignation of an administrator, and orders the bond to be canceled on the appointment and qualification of a successor, and creditors appeal, other creditors and the widow and heirs of decedent are not necessary parties.[46]

equity could grant relief against the surety on the administration bond.[50]

Successive breaches. An administrator's bond is a continuing one commensurate in time with his duties, and each violation of it is a breach and furnishes a cause of action. The obligation on the bond continues so long as there remains any duty which an administrator is legally liable to perform, and there may be successive and distinct breaches of the bond growing out of the same transaction.[51]

[§ 2576] 2. Failure to Make and File Inventory.[52] There is a breach of an administration bond where the executor or administrator fails to return a true and complete inventory,[53] or to make and file an inventory of the estate within the time required[54] either by law[55] or by the condition of the bond.[56]

[§ 2577] 3. Failure to Collect Assets.[57] The failure to collect assets, so far as is possible by the exercise of good faith and due prudence and diligence on the part of the representative, is a breach of the bond;[58] but there is no breach because of a failure to collect which was not due to the fault of the representative, but to causes which he in the exercise of due diligence could not have prevented.[59]

[§ 2578] 4. Failure to Pay Allowance to Surviving Wife, Etc. Where a special allowance to the surviving wife, husband, or children is provided for by statute,[60] a failure on the part of the executor or administrator to pay such allowance as the statute or order of court may direct has been held to be a breach of the bond,[61] although there is also authority for the contrary view.[62] It has been held that, as an order that an administrator retain a balance in his hands after settlement and apply it to the support of infant heirs is illegal, the sureties on the administration bond are not liable after such settlement and discharge in case the administrator converts the balance to his own use.[63]

[a] A breach may consist in: (1) A failure to inventory money of the estate received before the granting of letters. Sherwood v. Hill, 25 Mo. 391. (2) A failure of the administrator to include a debt due from himself. Williams v. Morehouse, 9 Conn. 470. But compare State v. Gregory, 119 Ind. 503, 22 NE 1 (such failure is immaterial where no damage has resulted therefrom).

[b] Lack of knowledge.—(1) A failure to include property of which the representative has no knowledge is not a breach of the bond. Booth v. Patrick, 8 Conn. 106; State v. Scott, 12 Ind. 529. (2) An administrator does not commit a breach of his bond by his failure to inventory property which decedent had conveyed in fraud of his creditors, if he did not know that the conveyance was fraudulent. Scofield v. Lounsbury, 8 Conn. 109; Booth v. Patrick, 8 Conn. 106.

[c] Where the selection of exemptions is not dependent upon the filing of an inventory, the failure of an administrator to include in the inventory certain property the existence of which was known to the person claiming the exemption cannot be assigned by such person as a breach. Hardin v. Pulley, 79 Ala. 381.

[d] Where an estate has been declared insolvent, suit cannot be maintained against an executor upon his official bond, assigning as a breach that he has not made a full inventory of the assets. Edwards v. Gibbs, 11 Ala. 292.

[e] Where the executor is the sole legatee under the will, and there are no creditors, his failure to file an inventory within the time prescribed by law is a mere technical breach of the bond, and is cured by filing the inventory before an action is brought. McKim v. Harwood, 129 Mass. 75.

[f] Administrator de bonis non.—The failure of an administrator de bonis non to make an inventory of all the estate which was not administered by the original administrator is a breach of the condition of his administration bond for which an action lies. Wilson v. Keeler, 2 D. Chipm. (Vt.) 16.

[§ 2579] 5. Failure or Refusal to Pay Claims—a. In General. In England it has been held that the failure of an executor or administrator to pay claims against the estate is not a breach of the administration bond.[64] But in the United States these decisions have been expressly disapproved,[65] and it is well settled that a failure or refusal to pay claims which have been legally established, to the extent of the assets, is a breach of duty on the part of the executor or administrator for which an action on the administration bond may be maintained;[66] and in some jurisdictions an action on the bond by a creditor of the estate is expressly allowed by statute.[67]

Contested claim. A refusal to pay a claim which the executor has never admitted to be justly due and the validity of which has not been settled by a judgment is not a breach of the bond.[68]

Judgment on note of representative. An administrator cannot bind the estate by giving his negotiable note as administrator, and his refusal to pay a judgment recovered on such note after settlement in favor of an innocent holder is not a breach of his bond.[69]

If the estate is insolvent failure to pay a claim because of lack of assets is not a breach of the bond,[70] unless the representative has failed to take the steps provided by statute to establish insolvency or insufficiency of assets, in which event an action may be maintained on the bond notwithstanding a lack of assets,[71]

[§ 2580] b. Claims Barred by Limitations or Failure to Present. It is not a breach of the bond for an executor or administrator to refuse to pay a claim against the estate which is barred by the statute of limitations[72] or by failure of the claimant to present it within the time provided by statute.[73] Where, however, the bar of the statute is not absolute but provision is made for equitable relief under peculiar circumstances, and a claim not presented in time is approved by the administrator and allowed by the court, the failure to pay it is a breach of the bond for which the sureties will be liable.[74]

[§ 2581] 6. Wrongful Payment of Claims. It is a breach of the bond wrongfully to pay claims to the detriment of creditors, distributees, or others interested in the estate,[75] as by paying claims for which the estate is not liable,[76] disregarding legal priorities among claimants where the assets are not sufficient to pay all in full,[77] or failing to make a pro rata distribution among claimants of the same

[g] Even though there has been no misapplication of the assets, the failure to pay debts is a breach of the bond. Dawes v. Shed, 15 Mass. 6, 8 AmD 80. (2) The same is true where the representative pleaded the statute, but afterward abandoned the plea and suffered a judgment by default. Robinson v. class;[78] and failure to resist payment of an unjust or unfounded claim against the estate is a breach of the bond, so far as the beneficiaries of the estate may suffer from the culpable negligence or bad faith of the representative in this respect.[79]

[§ 2582] 7. Failure to Sell Land for Payment of Debts. It is not a breach of an ordinary administration bond for the executor or administrator to fail or refuse to apply for a license to sell land of the decedent for the payment of debts,[80] to fail to sell the lands when authorized to do so,[81] or, after having made a sale, to refuse to receive the purchase money and execute a deed to the purchaser for the land.[82]

[§ 2583] 8. Wrongful Sale of Land. It is a breach of the administration bond for an executor or administrator by falsely representing the condition of the estate to obtain an order for the sale of land to pay debts and to make a sale thereunder when such sale is not necessary,[83] or to sell on credit instead of for cash;[84] but where a sale is made under a void decree, no title passes to the purchaser, and there is no injury for which an action on the bond can be maintained.[85]

Estoppel to complain. Where executors sold real estate without authority, and devisees, without any objection, received the proceeds, they were estopped to claim that such action on the part of the executors constituted a breach of their bond.[86]

[§ 2584] 9. Failure or Refusal to Pay Legacies.[87] The failure or refusal of an executor or an administrator with the will annexed, having sufficient assets, to pay a legacy after it has become his legal duty to do so is a breach of the bond;[88] but until it has become his legal duty to make such payment his failure to do so is not a breach,[89] nor is the failure of an executor to pay from money in his hands legacies which were chargeable upon the testator's land a breach.[90]

Bond not conditioned to pay legacies. It has been held that if only an ordinary administration bond is given by an administrator with the will annexed, such bond containing no condition for the payment of legacies, a failure to pay legacies is not a breach.[91]

[§ 2585] 10. Failure or Refusal to Make Distribution.[92] The failure or refusal of an administrator to pay over or distribute the estate as required by the decree of distribution is a breach of the administration bond;[93] but it is not a breach of the bond to refuse to make distribution before the amount for distribution and the persons entitled thereto have been ascertained and an order or decree for distribution made.[94] There is, however, a breach of the bond where the representative fails to apply for an order of distribution within a reasonable time after the settlement of his account,[95] and if a loss to the estate occurs through his neglect to do so his bond is liable therefor.[96]

Where a refunding bond is required,[97] it is not a breach of the administration bond to refuse distribution where such bond has not been given or tendered.[98]

If the bond contains no clause securing the interests of distributees, the sureties will not be liable for failure or refusal to distribute,[99] notwithstanding the bond is conditioned "to well and truly administer according to law."[1]

Failure or refusal to comply with a void decree of distribution is not a breach of the bond.[2]

On the death of an administrator no action can be maintained on his bond for not taking and distributing certain property belonging to the intestate's estate, because it passes to the administrator de bonis non by whom the settlement of the estate is to be completed.[3]

[§ 2586] 11. Conversion or Waste of Estate. It is a breach of the bond for the principal to convert to his own use or waste the estate committed to him.[4] An administrator who, at the time of his appointment as guardian of minor distributees, is insolvent, and has previously converted the assets of the estate to his own use, cannot transfer the estate to himself as guardian so as to relieve the sureties on his administration bond of liability.[5] So also, the sureties of a representative in one state cannot escape liability for misappropriation of funds coming rightfully into his hands as such representative by the fact that he turned the funds over to himself as representative of the same estate under an appointment in another state, without the approval of the court, and without taxes having been paid as required by the statute of the first state.[6]

[§ 2587] 12. Failure to Account. There is a breach of the bond where the executor or administrator fails to render accounts of his administration as required by law or by the conditions of his bond,[7] or where in making settlements for the pur-

[a] Where an administrator's account has been adjusted on appeal and a balance ordered to be paid over, a failure to do so is a breach of the bond. Dawes v. Sweet, 14 Mass. 105.

[b] Where the statutory provisions are not followed in the settlement and distribution of the estate, the fact that the administrator proceeded under the instructions of the orphans' court will not prevent a liability on the bond to an excluded distributee. Shriver v. State, 65 Md. 278, 4 A 679.

[c] If the distributee is an infant and has no guardian, the nonpayment of the amount ascertained by the decree of the ordinary to be due on the distributive share is not a sufficient breach to sustain an action on the bond by a prochein ami. Mitchell v. Connolly, 17 S. C. L. 203.

[d] Where a distributive share has been assigned, payment to the heir, under order of court, instead of to the assignee, is not a breach of the bond. Peo. v. Rigdon, 204 Ill. A. 309.

[a] An order ascertaining the amount of funds in the hands of an administrator, and directing him to pay the same into court for the benefit of the heirs, but not adjudging who are the legal distributees, is insufficient as a basis for an action on the administrator's bond for failure to make distribution. pose of showing the condition of the estate he fails to render a true and accurate account.[8] But it has been held that a refusal to account for a particular sum of money, either on the ground that it was never received,[9] or was not received on account of the estate,[10] or has already been included in an account settled [11] is not a breach of the condition of the bond.

Where an executor is sole legatee and there are no creditors, a failure to file an account within the time required by law is merely a technical breach which is cured by filing the account before suit brought.[12]

A settlement after an action on the bond is instituted will not cure the breach nor bar the action.[13]

Waiver of breach. The breach is waived by the allowance of an account without exception after the time required for filing the account, but before an action has been brought on the bond;[14] but the breach is not waived by the action of the court in pronouncing unsatisfactory an account presented after the breach, and by a subsequent account on which no decree is rendered, although these are circumstances which may be evidence of a waiver.[15]

[§ 2588] 13. Failure to Turn Over Assets to Successor. Failure of an executor or administrator to turn over assets of the estate to his successor in office on a revocation of his letters or his resignation or removal is a breach of the bond.[16] An executor's refusal to pay money into the probate court upon his resignation is not a breach of the bond, for it is the duty of the court in such cases to appoint a successor who alone is competent to receive the estate.[17]

[§ 2589] F. Conclusiveness of Adjudications against Principal. The generally accepted rule is that a judgment or decree against an executor or administrator is conclusive against the sureties on his bond,[18] although they were not parties to the

[a] "The reason for this holding, as stated by the courts, is that by his contract the surety puts himself in privity with the administrator, and being so in privity he is bound by any decree that the surrogate has jurisdiction to make." McMahon v. Smith, 24 App. Div. 25, 28, 49 NYS 93.

[b] In the District of Columbia, it has been considered unnecessary to determine whether a judgment against the principal was conclusive against the surety, it being at least prima facie evidence against him. American Bonding, etc., Co. v. U. S., 23 App. 535.

[c] In South Carolina: (1) Some cases hold such a judgment or decree to be not conclusive but prima facie evidence only. Kaminer v. Hope, 9 S. C. 253; Stewart v. McCully, 39 S. C. L. 80; Ordinary v. Carlile, 26 S. C. L. 100; Buckner v. Archer, 26 S. C. L. 85; Ordinary v. Condy, 20 S. C. L. 313; Simkins v. Cobb, 18 S. C. L. 60; Lyles v. Caldwell, 14 S. C. L. 225. (2) Other cases hold that such a decree is conclusive (Norton v. Wallace, 31 S. C. L. 460 [quot Norton v. Wallace, 30 S. C. L. 507]; Chambers v. Patton, 17 S. C. L. 130; Lyles v. Brown, 16 S. C. L. 31) and (3) subject to impeachment by the surety only on the ground of fraud or collusion (Boyd v. Caldwell, 38 S. C. L. 117.

[d] The sureties on the official bond of a sheriff who has been appointed administrator by virtue of his office of sheriff and has qualified and acted as such under said bond are, in the absence of fraud, concluded by a decree of a probate court against their principal in the final settlement of his accounts as such administrator. Ragland v. Calhoun, 36 Ala. 606.

[e] Matters concluded.—While the decree of the probate court on final settlement equally concludes the sureties and the principal as to matters of the account, it is otherwise as to the due execution of the bond or other defenses personal to the sureties. Martin v. Tally, 72 Ala. 23.

[f] Account of second administrator.—Under Rev. L. c 162 § 2, a decree on a second account presented by a second administrator was conclusive on the surety of the first administrator. Allen v. Puritan Trust Co., 211 Mass. 409, 97 NE 916, LRA 1915C 518.

[g] There are some exceptions to the rule that the sureties are bound by a judgment recovered against the principal, as where he fails to plead the statute of limitation or allows himself to be defaulted or the judgment is suffered collusively. McKim v. Haley, 173 Mass. 112, 53 NE 152.

[h] Where the action was against the administrator personally and on a cause of action for which the estate was not liable, the fact that judgment was by mistake entered against the administrator as representative will not make it conclusive against the sureties. Williams v. Hinkle, 15 Ala. 713.

Banks v. Speers, 103 Ala. 436, 16 S. 25.

[b] Showing real amount of assets.—Where it is provided by statute that in an action on the bond for a devastavit, an administrator may show the real amount of assets at the time the original judgment was rendered against him, the sureties should be allowed the same privilege, although not mentioned in the act. legatee, or distributee is conclusive as to the nature and validity of the claim,[25] although not of the existence or sufficiency of assets to pay the same.[26] The sureties cannot set up in an action on the bond any irregularities in the decree against the principal,[27] or in the proceedings on which it was based;[28] but they are not precluded from showing that the decree was obtained through fraud or collusion,[29] or that the court exceeded its jurisdiction.[30] In a few jurisdictions, however, it is held that a judgment or decree against the principal is not conclusive against the surety but only prima facie evidence;[31] and even where the general rule is recognized it is not inflexible.[32] Thus the general rule is held not to apply to sureties on the bond of a deceased executor or administrator where the decree is based upon a settlement made by his personal representative,[33] or by an administrator de bonis non,[34] or in cases where judgment is rendered against the representative after his authority as such has terminated,[35] or after the sureties have been discharged from liability.[36] So also it is held that in order that the surety of an administrator may be precluded by a judgment ascertaining the balance in his principal's hands, it must appear that he was a party to the action,[37] and that, where the statute requires sureties on an administrator's bond to be made parties to a voluntary accounting by the administrator, a decree of the surrogate on such accounting directing payment of a specified amount by the administrator is not binding on the sureties, where they were not cited and did not appear in the proceeding.[38] Where a surety on an administrator's bond has died several years before any notice was given or judgment rendered against the principal on final settlement, and there was no administration of the estate of the deceased surety, a judgment rendered against the principal on the final settlement was held not conclusive against the surety's estate.[39]

[§ 2590] G. Who May Enforce Liability on Bond—1. In General. The general rule is that as an administration bond is intended for the benefit and protection of all persons interested in the administration of the estate and the proper application of its assets,[40] an action thereon may be maintained by any person so interested who has sustained an injury by any breach of its conditions.[41]

[§ 2591] 2. Heirs and Distributees. An administration bond inures to the benefit of heirs and distributees,[42] and they may sue for any breach of condition by which they have been injured.[43] It has been considered that if the representative has died, resigned, or been removed, and the estate owes no debts, an heir or distributee may sue without the necessity of the appointment of an administrator de bonis non,[44] but there is also authority for the view that under such circumstances an action on the bond can be brought only by an administrator de bonis non.[45] Where there are creditors whose claims have not been paid, only an administrator de bonis non can sue on the bond of the former representative;[46] and if an administrator de bonis non has been actually appointed he is the proper person to enforce any liability on the bond even though there are no unpaid creditors.[47]

The widow or heir of a deceased heir cannot sue on the bond for such heir's distributive interest, but the action must be by the personal representative of the deceased heir.[48]

Where a distributee has assigned his interest, an action on the bond to recover the same should ordinarily be brought on the relation of the assignor to the use of the assignee,[49] but it has been held that the assignee is a "party aggrieved" within the meaning of a code provision permitting the party aggrieved to sue in his own name.[50]

[§ 2592] 3. Legatees and Devisees. A legatee or devisee may sue on an administration bond where he has been injured by a breach of its condition.[51] In case the legatee or devisee is an infant the action should be brought by his next friend,[52] or by his lawfully authorized attorney.[53] In case of the death of a legatee or devisee his personal representative may bring an action on the bond of the executor.[54]

When action should be brought for benefit of estate. Where the breaches alleged consist of the executor's failure to return an inventory, and wasting and converting the assets to his own use, the action for such breaches should be brought for the benefit of the estate and not for the benefit of a particular legatee or distributee.[55]

The assignee of a decree for a legacy cannot sue on the bond to recover the same, since a legacy is not assignable at law and such action can be maintained only on the relation of the person who has the legal right.[56]

[§ 2593] 4. Creditors. A creditor of the estate may sue on the bond for a breach of its conditions by which he had been injured,[57] but one creditor cannot sue for his individual debt and recover for the full amount thereof to the prejudice of other creditors equally entitled.[58]

A creditor of an heir has no direct interest in the bond and is not entitled to sue thereon.[59]

[§ 2594] 5. Administrator De Bonis Non. At common law an administrator de bonis non could not maintain an action on the bond of his predecessor,[60] the bond being considered as indemnity only to those interested in the estate as creditors, legatees, or distributees,[61] and such is apparently still the law in some jurisdictions.[62] In other jurisdictions, the administrator de bonis non may sue on the bond with respect to assets which were not administered by his predecessor,[63] but this is the limit of his right, and he cannot sue for other breaches, such as maladministration, waste, conversion, etc.[64] The generally accepted modern rule is, however, that the administrator de bonis non may sue for any breach of the bond of his predecessor,[65] and indeed it has been held that, where an administrator de bonis non has been appointed, his right to sue for a breach of the bond of the former representative excludes that of the heirs or creditors,[66] although if the administrator de bonis non refuses to sue, a creditor may bring an action, making the administrator de bonis non a party defendant.[67]

A public administrator who has succeeded to the rights of a special administrator and to whom the bond of the latter has been duly assigned for the purpose of prosecution may bring an action as public administrator upon the bond.[68]

Marsh v. Peo., 15 Ill. 284 [foll Duffin v. Abbott, 48 Ill. 17 (overr Stose v. Peo., 25 Ill. 600)]. (2) But a later statute extended the right of the administrator de bonis non to cases where the former representative had died. Peo. v. Pacific Surety Co., 130 Ill. A. 502.

[b] Where an administrator gave no notice of his appointment as required by Code § 3304, so that it could not be said that the statutory period for filing claims, which commences to run by reason of the giving of the notice, had expired without claims being filed, and that hence the estate was not indebted, an administrator de bonis non appointed after the discharge of such administrator, being bound to preserve the assets of the estate to meet claims, was the proper party to sue the administrator and the sureties on his bond for funds for which the administrator did not account. or real plaintiff must be one who was or may have been injured by the alleged breaches of the condition.[69]

[§ 2596] 7. Corepresentative. Where one corepresentative has died, resigned, or been removed from office, the other may sue on the former's bond for any breach committed by him, where they have given separate bonds,[70] or if they have given a joint and several bond he may, as the representative of the estate, sue on such bond,[71] notwithstanding any individual liability to the sureties on the bond for the acts of his corepresentative.[72] One corepresentative cannot of course sue on the bond for his own benefit where he is himself in default,[73] but it has been held that an innocent corepresentative who is also a legatee may sue on the bond for the default of the other, although by virtue of the bond both might be sued by a creditor or other legatee.[74]

[§ 2597] 8. Right of Principal to Enforce Liability of Sureties. It has been said that an insolvent administrator may recover against his own sureties for the benefit of the creditors of the estate,[75] but he cannot of course sue on the bond to recover for his individual benefit.[76]

[§ 2598] H. Nature and Form of Remedy—1. In General. The usual method of enforcing the liability on an administration bond is by an action brought on the bond in a court of law,[77] although in some jurisdictions other forms of remedy are provided by statute,[78] and in others proceedings in equity are allowed in some cases.[79] A statutory remedy has been regarded as exclusive.[80]

Bond of county administrator. Persons interested in an estate vested in a county administrator who has not been required to give any other bond than as county administrator are entitled to the same remedies on such bond as the law affords to persons interested in any estate on the ordinary bond of the administrator.[81]

[§ 2600] I. Actions on Administration Bond—1. Right of Action—a. Actual Injury Necessary. No action for a mere technical breach of an administration bond can be maintained by or for the benefit of a person to whom no injury has resulted,[90] nor is an action on the bond maintainable

[a] In whose name execution issues.—Execution does not issue in favor of the obligee, but the parties in whose favor the decree is rendered are entitled to executions in their own names against the sureties of defendant in the decree. Cawthorn v. Knight, 11 Ala. 579.

[b] Execution against representative of deceased executor.—A return of "no property" on an execution issued against the administrator of a deceased executor upon final settlement of his intestate's administration will not authorize the issuance of execution against the securities of the executor. Jenkins v. Gray, 16 Ala. 100.

[c] Judgment obtained by administrator against his coadministrator.—An administrator who as distributee of the estate obtains a decree and execution against his coadministrator for assets received and not accounted for cannot, on a return of "no property," have execution against the joint securities of himself and his coadministrator. Little v. Heard, 16 Ala. 358.

[d] The official bond of a sheriff becomes an administration bond when the administration of an estate is committed to him ex officio and his sureties are liable to an execution for his default, without a previous suit on the bond. Payne v. Thompson, 48 Ala. 535.

[e] Premature issuance.—A summary execution against the sureties issued before the return day of the execution against the administrator individually is voidable only, and a sale made thereunder would be valid until set aside. Steele v. Tutwiler, 68 Ala. 107.

for an act of the representative where the injury is remote and altogether in the nature of consequential damages.[91]

[§ 2601] b. Conditions Precedent—(1) Establishing Liability of Estate. Before a creditor, legatee, or distributee can sue on an administration bond to enforce payment of his claim against the estate, the liability of the estate must be established.[92] So a creditor cannot sue on the bond until his claim has been established by a judgment,[93] or has been ascertained and allowed by the probate court.[94] The fact that plaintiff, after securing an allowance of his claim in the federal court, applied to the probate court for an order directing the executors to pay the same did not affect his right to recover on the executors' bond for their refusal to pay the claim.[95] Where a legacy is specific, the amount definite and certain, and the liability of the obligors absolute according to the conditions of the bond, no allowance by the court is necessary as a condition precedent to an action on the bond for a failure to pay the same.[96] But it has been held that a distributee or

[b] The failure of an administrator to take refunding bonds (1) on dividing property among the distributees, although technically a devastavit, will not render him and his sureties liable on his administration bond where deceased had ample other property to pay all his debts. Worthy v. Brower, 93 N. C. 344. [a] Taking possession of partnership assets.—Where the administrator of the individual estate of a member of a firm who dies intestate gives the further bond required by the statute and takes possession of the entire property of the partnership for the purpose of settling the partnership estate and thereafter converts such property to his own use, an action can be maintained against him and the sureties on such bond by any partnership creditor without any allowance of such creditor's claim in the probate court, or any settlement of the partnership affairs in such court. residuary legatee cannot sue on the bond until the amount for distribution and the persons entitled thereto have been ascertained by the probate court,[97] although a contrary view has also been asserted.[98] Where defendants admit a breach of forfeiture of the bond, the objection that the legatee's demand was not reduced to certainty by a judgment of a court or otherwise cannot afterward be raised.[99]

[§ 2602] (2) Final Settlement and Accounting —(a) Action by Legatee or Distributee. The general rule is that no action on an administration bond can be maintained by a legatee or distributee for the nonpayment of his legacy or distributive share until after a final settlement and accounting in the probate court,[1] for the reason that until then the amount applicable to such payments and the persons entitled thereto are not definitely ascertained.[2] There are, however, cases in which this rule has been denied,[3] and it has also been held that, where no accounting can be had, as in the case of a representative who converts the assets of the estate to his own use and dies insolvent in a foreign jurisdiction, a court of equity will enforce the liability of the sureties without requiring an accounting.[4] Where a representative dies, absconds, or is beyond the jurisdiction of the court, the proper method in order to ascertain whether he is liable and to what extent so as to bind the sureties on his official bond is by a proceeding in the nature of a civil action wherein the sureties are made parties.[5] So also, it has been held that, in an equitable suit on the bond to recover legacies which were a charge upon real estate devised to the administrator with the will annexed who converted the personalty to his own use and died insolvent, the complaint charging that nothing remained of the estate of the testator or of the administrator which could be reached, an accounting was not necessary as the basis of equity jurisdiction.[6]

[§ 2603] (b) Action by Creditor. It has been held that a creditor cannot sue on the bond until after a final accounting and settlement;[7] but a contrary view has also been asserted,[8] and it has been laid down that a creditor may, before final settlement, sue on the bond for the nonpayment of a claim which has been judicially ascertained and ordered to be paid,[9] or to recover damages for acts of maladministration constituting a breach of the conditions of the bond,[10] and that if the principal has left the state and the court cannot get jurisdiction over him to compel an accounting an action may nevertheless be maintained against the sureties.[11]

[§ 2604] (c) Action by Successor in Office. A suit on the bond for failure to pay over assets of the estate to a successor in office may, it has been held, be maintained before final settlement;[12] but this has also been denied.[13]

[§ 2605] (3) Citation to Account. In some jurisdictions an action on the bond for a failure to account cannot be maintained until there has been a citation or order for an accounting and a failure to comply therewith,[14] but in others no citation or order is necessary.[15]

pal.[16] In some jurisdictions it is held that an action cannot be brought on an administration bond until after a judgment against the principal establishing his liability,[17] but in others an action may be maintained on the bond in the first instance against both principal and sureties without a prior judgment against the representative alone.[18]

In equity, it is held that, even though the rule might be otherwise at law, the liability of sureties may be enforced without a prior judgment against the principal.[19] But a suit against the sureties alone to which neither the administrator nor his representative is made a party cannot be maintained without a prior judgment against the administrator,[20] except where such joinder is impossible and plaintiff unless allowed to proceed against the sureties alone would be left remediless.[21]

cipal. In some jurisdictions there must be not only a judgment against the representative but also an attempt to enforce the same against him before an action on the bond can be maintained,[22] but in others a judgment establishing the principal's liability is sufficient without the necessity of a return of execution against him unsatisfied.[23]

[§ 2608] (6) Establishing Devastavit in Separate Suit against Principal.[24] At common law no action could be brought on an administration bond for a devastavit until after the devastavit was established in a separate suit against the principal,[25] and such appears still to be the law in some jurisdictions.[26] In most jurisdictions, however, although in some of them the earlier decisions supported the common-law rule,[27] an action for a devastavit may now be brought on the bond in the first instance without the necessity of a previous suit against the principal.[28]

[a] In Louisiana (1) an action on the bond against the sureties cannot be maintained "until the necessary steps shall have been taken to enforce payment against the principal." Ricks v. Gantt, 35 La. Ann. 920; Gaillard v. Bordelon, 35 La. Ann. 390; Pickett v. Gilmer, 32 La. Ann. 991; Lobit v. Castille, 13 La. Ann. 563; Wilson v. Murrell, 6 Rob. 68. (2) The "necessary steps" are suit, judgment, and execution (Hayes v. Dugas, 51 La. Ann. 447, 25 S 121; Ricks v. Gantt, 35 La. Ann. 920; Gaillard v. Bordelon, 35 La. Ann. 390; Nicholson v. Ogden, 6 La. Ann. 486), (3) unless the representative is insolvent (Lynch's Succ., 14 La. Ann. 235), (4) which fact, to take the case out of the general rule, must be judicially established (Gaillard v. Bordelon, 35 La. Ann. 390; Picket v. Gilmer, 32 La. Ann. 991). (5) If execution against the principal has been returned unsatisfied or his insolvency judicially established no further proceedings before suit on the bond are necessary. Ricks v. Gantt, 35 La. Ann. 920; Bougeat v. Adams, 11 La. Ann. 78. (6) Statutory proceedings by judgment creditors of the succession by which the representative's liability to creditors for funds belonging to the succession, and her insolvency, are established may justify a suit by creditors against her sureties. Thompson v. American Surety Co., 144 La. 1097, 81 S 731.

[b] In Maryland (1) it is provided by statute that no creditor can maintain an action against the administrator of his debtor upon his administration bond before a non est returned upon a capias ad respondendum against the administrator, or a fieri facias returned nulla bona or other apparent insolvency. State v. Moore, 108 Md. 636, 71 A 461; Seegar v. State, 5 Harr. & J. 488. (2) This statute was held to be in force in Washington county, D. C. U. S. v. Kennedy, 26 F. Cas. No. 15,520, 4 Cranch C. C. 592; U. S. v. Queen, 27 F. Cas. No. 16,109, 3 Cranch C. C. 420. (3) The act refers in express terms to creditors and does not apply to distributees or other classes of claimants. U. S. v. King, 8 D. C. 499.

[c] Where the letters of an executor have been revoked, an action on his bond may, under the New York statute, be maintained without the necessity of a return of execution unsatisfied. Hood v. Hayward, 124 N. Y. 1, 26 NE 331 [mod 48 Hun 330, 1 NYS 566].

[d] Where compliance impossible.—Where the statutory prerequisite of return of execution against the principal cannot from the nature of the case be complied with, the liability of the sureties on the bond may be enforced in a proceeding in equity. Haines v. Meyer, 25 Hun (N. Y.) 414.

[e] Sufficiency of return.—(1) A fieri facias on a judgment against an administrator returned "no unadministered or unencumbered effects found," etc., is a sufficient return of nulla bona to entitle plaintiff to an action on the administration bond. Allen v. Cunningham, 3 Leigh (30 Va.) 395. (2) Where a fieri facias against an administrator directs the sheriff to levy the amount of the goods, etc., of the deceased and of defendant, a return that "the defendant has no property upon which to levy this execution" does not show a devastavit. Beasley v. Mott, 46 S. C. L. 354. (3) The surety on an administrator's bond cannot object to the return of nulla bona on a writ of fieri facias against the principal on the ground that the sheriff made his return after the return day of the writ had passed. Soldini v. Hyams, 15 La. Ann. 551.

[f] An execution against the administrator in his individual capacity, on his failure to pay the judgment creditors of the succession out of the funds of the estate adjudged to be in his hands, is sufficient to authorize proceedings by a creditor against the surety on the administrator's bond. Christian v. Lassiter, 23 La. Ann. 573.

(Ala.) 348, 350 ("If execution had been sued out, and returned nulla bona, it would have shown the default of the executor; and the securities might then have been resorted to, on the bond").

[a] The principal need not be pushed to insolvency, but a judgment at law or a decree of the orphans' court is all that is necessary as a prerequisite to a suit on the bond. Com. v. Stubb, 11 Pa. 150, 51 AmD 515; Com. v. Dill, 1 Phila. (Pa.) 556.

tative. Where an administrator has converted the funds of the estate, it is not necessary that he should have been actually removed from office in order that the distributees may be entitled to sue on the bond.[29]

[§ 2610] (8) Order for Payment. By the weight of authority there must be not only a final settlement,[30] but also an order of court directing payment to be made, and a failure to comply therewith, before a distributee,[31] a legatee,[32] a person entitled to allowance for support,[33] or a creditor [34] can bring an action on the bond for nonpayment of his claim, unless, in the case of a creditor, it is shown that there are sufficient assets to pay the claim and that it remains unpaid after demand.[35] But there is also authority for the view that a legatee,[36] distributee,[37] or creditor [38] may sue on the bond without any order expressly directing payment to him. It is usually considered that where a representative dies, resigns, or is removed, an order for the payment over of assets to a successor in office is not necessary to entitle the latter to sue on the bond of the former representative,[39] although there is also authority for the contrary view.[40]

[§ 2611] (9) Demand. Where an executor or administrator has failed to pay creditors, legatees, or distributees, it is held in most jurisdictions that no demand for payment is necessary in order to maintain an action on the bond.[41] In a few jurisdictions, however, a demand against the representative is necessary;[42] but no demand is necessary against the sureties,[43] even in jurisdictions where it is necessary against the principal,[44] nor is a demand required before an action by an administrator de bonis non.[45]

[§ 2612] (10) Tender of Refunding Bond. The tender of a refunding bond by a distributee is not a condition precedent to a right of action on the administration bond,[46] but the question whether the want of such bond was an obstacle to the settlement of the estate is for the consideration of the jury.[47]

[§ 2613] (11) Reformation of Bond from Which Amount of Penalty Omitted. Although the amount of the penalty is omitted from an administration bond, an action may be brought and a recovery had thereon without reformation.[48]

[§ 2614] (12) Leave to Sue—(a) Necessity. As the general rule an order of court granting leave to sue is a necessary condition precedent to an action on the bond,[49] although in a few jurisdictions this is not required,[50] and even in those jurisdictions where it is necessary as a general rule circumstances may render it unnecessary,[51] and leave of court is usually not required where the action is brought by an administrator de bonis non.[52] The objection that leave to sue has not been obtained can be taken only by a special plea in abatement.[53]

[§ 2615] (b) Application and Proceedings. The proper course in procuring leave to sue upon an administration bond is to make a written application to the court asking for such authority,[54] which should be made by the person aggrieved by the breach of the bond complained of,[55] and should state the facts upon which the application is based[56] and the interest and claim of the applicant,[57] and be duly verified.[58] The application is ex parte in its character,[59] and it is not necessary to give the obligors notice thereof,[60] or to cite the representative to show cause why it should not be granted.[61] In some cases the applicant is required to give a bond for costs.[62] The granting of leave rests somewhat in the discretion of the court.[63] It is the duty of the probate judge to see that the bond is not prosecuted at the instance of a stranger, or for the purpose of vexation or oppression,[64] but beyond this the granting of leave is practically a matter of course.[65] It is sometimes required that the certificate of leave be filed in the county court.[66]

[§ 2616] (c) Form and Effect of Order. The order granting leave to sue must be in writing[67] and

[a] If the decree bears date prior to the bringing of the action evidence is not admissible at the trial to show that it was not reduced to writing till after the action was brought; the proper remedy is by an application to the judge of probate to amend the record. Richardson v. Hazleton, 101 Mass. 108.

[b] An indorsement on a certified copy of the bond that it appeared to the satisfaction of the court that the petitioner was a creditor of the estate and that the administrator had neglected to file an inventory or to render an account as required by law and that on the petitioner's request an action is authorized to be brought on the bond is a sufficiently formal signed by the judge.[68] If not in conformity with the statute it may be amended by the court.[69] It has been held that the order granting leave to sue is conclusive in all collateral proceedings,[70] and its validity cannot be questioned in an action on the bond;[71] but it has also been asserted that defendants in such action are at liberty to show that there was no previous proceeding which authorized the surrogate to order the bond to be prosecuted.[72] The representative cannot appeal from an order authorizing an action to be brought on his bond.[73] After the commencement of an action on the bond, the probate court cannot effectively vacate its order granting leave to bring such action.[74]

[§ 2617] 2. Time to Sue—a. Premature Actions. Subject to conditions precedent that must be complied with,[75] an action on an administration bond may be brought as soon as there has been a breach of its conditions.[76] A statute providing that an executor or administrator shall not be liable to any suit by a creditor until after the expiration of eighteen months from the date of his administration bond has been held not to apply to an action upon the bond seeking to enforce a personal liability of the representative for a breach of the duties of his trust.[77] The existence of a small unpaid allowance in favor of a creditor of a decedent's estate at the commencement of an action by the distributees for a breach of the administrator's bond does not render the action premature, where the allowance is paid by a distributee before the filing of the amended petition, in which all claim to reimbursement therefor is waived.[78] An action on the bond cannot be brought pending an appeal from the order on which the right of action is based,[79] but a mere right to appeal from the order does not suspend the right of action on the bond during the period allowed for taking such appeal.[80]

[§ 2618] b. Limitations—(1) Period of Limitation. Statutes limiting the time within which creditors of the estate must commence actions on their claims[81] do not apply to actions on an administration bond,[82] and the same has been held to be true with respect to general statutes of limitations;[83] but in a number of jurisdictions special statutes have been enacted limiting the time within which actions on administration bonds must be brought.[84] It has been held that such a statute applies to an action on the bond of a public administrator,[85] and that the lapse of the prescribed period will bar summary proceedings by way of citation and attachment as well as an action at law on the bond.[86]

[§ 2619] (2) When Statute Begins to Run. The period of limitations with respect to an action on an administration bond begins to run as soon as, but not until, a cause of action on the bond accrues.[87] In jurisdictions where such conditions precedent are essential to the commencement of an action on the bond,[88] the statute will not begin to run until there has been a judgment or order establishing plaintiff's claim as a liability of the estate,[89] a judicial ascertainment of the default of the principal,[90] a final accounting,[91] an order of payment of legacies,[92] or a demand for payment;[93] but it has been held that an order granting leave to sue, although essential, is no part of the cause of action but merely a step in the remedy, and that the statute will run notwithstanding failure to procure such an order.[94] For failing to include property in a report of assets, the statute begins from the filing of the report;[95] for converting property of the estate, from the date of conversion;[96] for failure to pay over assets to a successor in office, from the time of demand for payment;[97] for a failure to account, from the time when an accounting is demanded and refused;[98] and for failing to comply with an order of court, from the time limited in the order for such compliance.[99] A right of action in favor of an administrator de bonis non accrues on revocation of the letters of the former representative.[1]

[§ 2620] c. Laches. A plaintiff may be barred on the ground of laches from bringing an action on an administration bond,[2] and a presumption of payment or satisfaction arises after a lapse of twenty years from the accrual of the right.[3] It has been held, however, that laches short of the full period of limitation will not defeat an action on the bond,[4] and that, where an action is brought on an administrator's bond from which the amount of the penalty was omitted, and the complaint contains allegations authorizing either legal or equitable relief and demands for both, on proof entitling plaintiff to legal relief plaintiff may recover on the bond as a sealed instrument, although there has been such a lapse of time as would bar relief in equity by way of reformation.[5] Where the action is based on fraud of the representative, and is brought as soon as the fraud is discovered, laches cannot be imputed to plaintiff.[6]

[§ 2621] 3. Defenses—a. In General. In an action on an administration bond the sureties are subrogated to all defenses which would have been available to the principal.[7] They may plead and prove any fact which would negative the liability of the principal,[8] and also any facts which would discharge them from liability,[9] regardless of what the liability of the principal alone might be;[10] but they cannot set up a defense which inures exclusively to the estate and not to the representative.[11] In an action for failure to pay a claim against the estate it is a good defense to show that plaintiff has in his possession[12] or has converted to his own use[13] sufficient funds of the estate to pay the claim, or that the person for whose benefit the action is brought has made a valid settlement of his claim with the representative.[14] A surety on an administration bond, who replaced a former surety, is entitled in a proceeding to charge the administrator with a devastavit, to show in defense that, if there was such a devastavit, it took place prior to the time when he became a surety.[15] In an action by a distributee the surety can plead a settlement among heirs subsequent to the order of distribution as a satisfaction of such order and a defense for the surety against the administrator's alleged breach of bond by failing to pay amount to plaintiff as ordered.[16] It is no defense that in committing the breach complained of the representative acted under advice of counsel,[17] or that since the action was instituted he has been removed from office and a successor appointed[18] or, where the suit is brought for the general benefit, that the person on whose representation it was instituted will not be entitled to share in the recovery.[19] Neither is it a defense that exceptions to the account of the administrator, filed by a creditor of the estate, had been withdrawn by him in consideration of a part payment of his claim by the administrator,[20] or that the bond was not in fact executed before the probate judge as required by statute.[21] The fact that certain property of the estate is claimed by a third person is no defense to an action for failure to include it in the inventory.[22] In an action against the administrator of a surety on an administration bond, the fact that defendant has also been appointed administrator of the sole beneficiary under the will of the original decedent, and has assumed charge of the assets of the estate in that capacity, affords no reason why judgment should not be rendered against him in the capacity in which he is sued.[23] The bond being a continuing obligation, each breach of which furnishes a cause of action, the waiver of any number of breaches is no bar to an action for a subsequent breach.[24] In an action by the receiver in supplementary proceedings of a distributee, a defense cannot be predicated on alleged fraudulent acts of the administrator and the distributee, which are not shown to have resulted in a surcharge of the administrator's accounts, or to have occurred prior to the vesting of plaintiff's title.[25]

[§ 2622] b. Want of Assets. The want of assets is a good defense to an action on the bond for failure to pay claims against the estate,[26] unless the representative has had assets and his inability to pay the claim in question is due to his own neglect or misconduct;[27] but to entitle a representative to defend upon the ground of insufficiency of assets there must be an inventory filed and a settlement of his account in the probate court,[28] and in some jurisdictions the defense is not available unless prior to the action on the bond a representation of insolvency was made.[29]

[§ 2623] c. Invalidity of Principal's Appointment. Neither principal nor sureties can set up as a defense to their liability on the bond the invalidity of the appointment under which the principal has acted,[30] for not only is the grant of administration not subject to collateral attacks in an action on the bond,[31] but both principal and sureties are estopped from questioning the validity of the appointment[32] by the recitals of the bond,[33] its voluntary execution,[34] and the fact that the principal has acted thereunder and obtained possession of assets of the estate.[35] So also, where the bond executed by the sureties of an administrator was conditioned that the administrator would discharge and perform all trusts committed to him as administrator of the estate of a certain decedent, "who died testate," the sureties could not take advantage of the fact that the order and letters appointing the administrator inaccurately described him as administrator, instead of administrator with the will annexed.[36]

[§ 2624] d. Performance of Conditions after Suit Commenced. Performance of the conditions of the bond after commencement of the suit thereon will not bar the action,[37] but plaintiff is entitled to recover at least nominal damages for the breach committed.[38]

[§ 2625] e. Limitations.[39] The statute of limitations is a good defense to an action on an administration bond,[40] but it cannot be taken advantage of unless pleaded.[41] A representative is not precluded on the ground of being a trustee from pleading the statute,[42] nor does the principle which prevents the statute of limitations from running against the state apply to administration bonds given nominally to the state but really for the benefit of others.[43] The fact that a claim was barred at the time judgment was rendered thereon against the estate is no defense to an action on the bond for failure to pay the judgment.[44]

[§ 2626] 4. Set-Off and Counterclaim. In an action on an administration bond assigning as breaches of the bond acts of misconduct on the part of the representative, the damages to be recovered are not necessarily liquidated and the action is not therefore one in which a set-off is allowable.[45] Furthermore since an action on the bond is against the obligors individually they cannot set off as against their personal liability an indebtedness of plaintiff to the estate,[46] nor can the sureties in an action against them set off a claim of the principal against the estate,[47] or against plaintiff.[48] It has been held, however, that in an action for failing to account for property of the estate received by a representative he may set up by way of counterclaim a claim of his own against the estate which has been duly allowed and is entitled to payment.[49] The sureties are not entitled to credit with respect to items for which the representative never made any claim in the probate court.[50]

[§ 2627] 5. Jurisdiction—a. In General. Ordinarily, in the absence of statute,[51] or of special circumstances making equitable interference necessary,[52] courts of law have exclusive jurisdiction of actions to enforce the liability on administration bonds.[53] The particular court having jurisdiction varies as to its designation in the different states,[54] and as between different courts of the same state the amount claimed is sometimes the controlling element in determining which is entitled to take jurisdiction.[55] The courts of the state where administration was granted, where the assets are located, where the administrator resided at the time of decedent's death, and where the surety resides, have jurisdiction of an action on the bond, although the administrator resides in another state.[56] Where one was appointed administrator in one state of property of a nonresident decedent, and gave a bond to the state, to the use of persons interested, and thereupon removed the fund to another state, where he converted it, a suit was maintainable in the latter state on the bond in the name of the state to which the bond was given, to compel payment of the money so converted to such state, to be administered in accordance with its laws.[57]

by statute;[59] nor has a probate judge any jurisdiction to call the sureties to account for the conduct of their principal or to render any decree against them.[60]

[§ 2629] c. Equity Jurisdiction. Although the jurisdiction of equity to enforce liability on administration bonds has been unequivocally denied,[61] the generally prevailing view, in the United States, is that such liability may be enforced in equity.[62] The remedy in equity sometimes exists by virtue of statutory provisions,[63] but many of the decisions sustaining such jurisdiction are based merely on the ground that permitting the enforcement of the bond in equity prevents multiplicity of suits and circuity of action, where plaintiff was obliged to come into equity in the first instance.[64] It is also held that the liability may be enforced in equity where the remedy at law is inadequate or not available.[65]

[§ 2630] 6. Venue. An action against an administrator and the sureties on his bond may be brought in the county of the residence of any of the parties, as the obligation of the principal and sureties on the bond is joint and several.[66] Where a bond is given in one state and the principal and sureties afterward become residents of another, a suit on the bond based on a decree rendered in the latter state may be brought in the courts of that state.[67]

[§ 2631] 7. Parties—a. Plaintiff. The question in whose name an action on an administration bond should be instituted is largely regulated by statutes which vary considerably in their provisions.[68] Under some statutes the action should be brought in the name of the state [69] or people,[70] or of the governor,[71] ordinary,[72] or probate judge,[73] or the successor in office of such officer;[74] while under others the injured person may sue in his own name,[75] or the action may be brought in the name of either the person injured or the nominal obligee for the use of such person.[76] Provision is sometimes made for an assignment of the bond by the probate judge to a person injured by a breach thereof, who may thereupon bring action,[77] or the judge of probate is authorized to instruct an administrator to bring suit on the bond.[78] Where the doctrine that an administrator de bonis non cannot sue on the bond of his predecessor is still adhered to,[79] it has been held that, where it appears, after the death of an executor, that he had committed a devastavit, the court of probate jurisdiction has power to appoint a trustee at the instance of the beneficiaries under the will to maintain a suit against the surety on the bond.[80] The name of the nominal plaintiff is a matter of form and not of substance and a mistake in that respect is not reached by a general demurrer.[81] A suit may be instituted on the relation of one creditor without joining the others as plaintiffs, but the judgment must be made to inure to the benefit of the estate generally and not to the individual creditor,[82] unless the estate is admitted to be solvent and sufficient to pay all its debts.[83] So also a suit by a legatee should be prosecuted for the benefit of all interested in the fund where there is an insufficiency of assets.[84] Where there are no creditors, a sole heir may sue on the bond of a deceased administrator without having an administrator de bonis non appointed and making him a party,[85] and the same rule has been held applicable to a suit by several distributees after the estate was fully administered.[86] After the amount due to each distributee is definitely ascertained, each has a separate right of action and may sue therefor without joining the others.[87] Distributees are not necessary parties plaintiff to a suit brought by an administrator de bonis non on the bond of his predecessor.[88] Where a particular right of action is given by statute to a particular class of claimants, other persons, although interested in the estate, are not necessary parties.[89] All persons interested in the subject of the action and in obtaining the relief demanded may join as plaintiffs.[90] So it has been held that several distributees may join in the same action,[91] at least where the action is brought before a final decree of distribution;[92] and the representative of a deceased legatee may join in an action with the other legatees.[93] Where a judgment has been rendered in favor of two persons against an administrator, and execution has been returned unsatisfied, the judgment creditors may join in an action against the sureties of the administrator, and the action will not be dismissed for improper joinder of plaintiffs, because, on appeal subsequently taken, it is held that the judgment relied on was unauthorized as to one of the parties.[94] A person interested in the administration of an estate vested in a county administrator may sue on the bond without joining as coplaintiffs persons interested in other estates, the administration of which has been vested in the county administrator, and who have grievances against him.[95] In action on an executor's bond for payment of claims against the estate, any error in failing to join other claimants named in the bond was obviated by their appearance and stipulation consenting to payment of plaintiff's claim and agreeing that, if their claims were finally allowed in excess of defendant's liability on the bond, they would accept the amount for which defendant was liable in full pro rata.[96]

[§ 2632] b. Defendant. Administration bonds are ordinarily joint and several, and either one or all of the obligors may be sued.[97] This was the rule at common law,[98] although it was necessary to treat the bond as either a joint or a several obligation and to bring the action either against one obligor or against all of the obligors jointly and not against any intermediate number.[99] This rule is now changed in some jurisdictions and plaintiff may at his option proceed against any number of the obligors.[1] So the principal may be sued without joining the sureties,[2] or the sureties may be sued without joining the principal[3] or the representative of a deceased principal;[4] or some of the sureties may be sued without joining the others.[5] The change in the common-law rule, however, applies only to actions at law and not where the liability is enforced in equity,[6] in which case all the obligors, or their representatives, who are able to respond to plaintiff, should be made parties.[7] The representative of a deceased principal or surety may be joined in an action on the bond against the surviving obligors,[8] and in a suit to correct a final settlement the sureties may be joined and their liability as to the amount found due enforced in the same proceeding.[9] It has been held that the sureties on two separate bonds given by the same principal may be joined in one action,[10] but this has been denied,[11] although in the same case it is held that a single summary proceeding may properly be brought against the sureties on both bonds.[12] Two successive administrators of the same estate and their respective sureties cannot be sued jointly on the separate bonds given by them.[13] A distributee who has been paid in full is not a necessary party to an action on the bond of the representative,[14] but it has been held that, in a suit in equity to enforce the liability of the sureties for the benefit of creditors, the devisees of the testator are necessary parties unless represented by an administrator de bonis non.[15] In an action on the bond of a deceased administrator by the personal representative of a distributee, in which it appears that the debts of the estate were paid, it is not necessary that the estate be represented by an administrator,[16] but the appointment of an administrator ad litem of the estate of the deceased administrator is proper.[17] A misjoinder of parties defendant can be taken advantage of only by those who should not have been made parties.[18]

[§ 2633] 8. Pleading—a. Declaration or Complaint—(1) In General. The general requirement that the averments of a pleading must be clear and unequivocal[19] applies to the declaration or complaint in an action on an administration bond.[20] A petition which seeks to avoid the effect of a judgment discharging the administrator should allege facts showing that the discharge was obtained by fraud.[21] An administrator de bonis non, suing on the bond of his predecessor, must allege that the latter had in his hands unadministered assets or the proceeds of such as had been converted into money and kept separate from, and unmixed with, his own;[22] but it is not necessary that his complaint should allege the names of the creditors or the vastavit has been established in a separate suit against the principal,[37] that a refunding bond has been tendered,[38] and that leave to sue has been obtained.[39] Where the statute authorizes an action on the bond of an administrator where execution has been returned unsatisfied on a judgment recovered against such administrator, and declares that, if the principal debtor is a resident of the state, the execution must have been issued to the county where he resides, a complaint on a judgment against an administrator is not objectionable for failure to allege that the administrator was a resident of the county to which the execution which was returned unsatisfied was issued.[40]

[§ 2636] (c) Execution of Bond. It must be alleged that defendants executed the bond on which the action is brought;[41] but it has been held not necessary to allege that the bond was approved, filed, and recorded.[42]

[§ 2637] (d) Conditions of Bond. In some states it is held to be unnecessary to set out the conditions of the bond in the declaration,[43] while in others it is held that, in order to state a cause of action against the sureties, the conditions of the bond must be set out,[44] and a mere allegation that the bond was conditioned according to law is insufficient.[45] Where more than one bond was given, and the action is on the second bond, the purpose of such bond must be stated in order to show for what acts the sureties are liable.[46]

[§ 2638] (e) Breach of Conditions. At common law it was not necessary for plaintiff to assign breaches in the declaration, but he might declare on the penalty and then make the assignment in the replication in case defendant should plead performance of the condition as a defense.[47] The modern practice, however, is to assign the breach in the declaration,[48] and plaintiff may assign any number of breaches.[49] The breach must be directly and positively averred,[50] the particular breach or breaches relied on being specifically stated,[51] together with the facts necessary to show the commission of the breach,[52] and that plaintiff has been injured thereby.[53] In other words a specific cause of action must be alleged with reasonable certainty and precision.[54] This, however, is all that good pleading requires,[55] and plaintiff need not anticipate pate and negative matters of defense[56] or set out matters lying more properly within the knowledge of defendant.[57] Setting out the condition in the language of the bond and alleging its nonperformance has been held to be sufficient,[58] but in some cases merely negativing the condition is not sufficient to show a breach.[59] Although only one of several breaches relied on be properly assigned the complaint is good against a general demurrer.[60]

[§ 2639] (3) Exhibits. It is not necessary, unless required by statute or rule of court,[61] to file with the complaint a copy of the bond,[62] of the will,[63] of the order for payment made by the probate court,[64] or of the settlement made by the representative;[65] and even where a copy of the bond is required to be filed it does not become a part of the record for the purposes of pleading,[66] but is merely notice to defendant of the cause of action and will not cure a defective statement in the declaration.[67]

[§ 2640] b. Plea or Answer—(1) In General. The plea or answer must meet the allegations of the declaration or complaint,[68] and must answer the whole cause of action stated therein[69] by stating facts and not merely conclusions without the facts on which they are based.[70] A plea which neither controverts the allegations of the declaration nor presents any matter in avoidance of them is bad on demurrer,[71] as is also a plea which tenders an immaterial issue.[72] Where a settlement and accounting with the proper court is relied on as a defense, a copy or transcript of the records referred to

[a] Plea properly stricken out as tendering immaterial issue.—A decree recited in the declaration in debt on an executor's bond, by which it was adjudged that one of the persons for whose benefit the action was brought was interested in the estate, and entitled to have the executor return an inventory and account, was conclusive as to such person's interest on the date it was rendered, and all pleas setting up a prior extinguishment of such interest without denying the rendition of the decree tendered immaterial issues, and should be stricken out. Westerly Prob. Ct. v. Potter, 25 R. I.

should be filed with the answer.[73] Averments in the answer of a surety that after he signed the bond the name of another person, as surety, was added to the bond without his consent, are properly stricken from the answer, because such averments are inconsistent, and also because, in the absence of an allegation that the person whose name was added signed after delivery of the bond, the answer does not negative the presumption that the principal had implied authority to secure other sureties before delivery.[74] In a suit on the bond based on a judgment by the ordinary which the administrator refused to pay, the sheriff having returned nulla bona as to him, allegations of the answer that the usees of plaintiff were not the heirs of decedent and the sureties were not bound by the judgment were properly stricken.[75]

[§ 2641] (2) Particular Pleas—(a) Performance. A general plea of performance in an action on an administration bond where special breaches are assigned is bad on demurrer,[76] as in such case there should be a specific answer.[77] If, however, defendant traverses the specific breaches assigned affirming that he has in these particulars performed the conditions of the bond there is a good issue between the parties and the plea is sufficient.[78] Where the declaration does not assign a breach, defendant may plead performance and plaintiff must then assign breaches in his replication.[79]

[§ 2642] (b) Release. A plea puis darrein continuance setting up a release by one of the persons for whose benefit the suit is brought of all claims against defendants sets up a substantial defense as to the person named therein,[80] and waives all previous pleas as to such person's interest.[81]

[§ 2643] (c) Plene Administravit. Ordinarily plene administravit is not a good plea in an action on an administration bond,[82] although it is sometimes permitted by statute.[83] It may be pleaded by the sureties where by statute their liability is limited to the amount of the assets,[84] or by the principal where certain claimants are entitled to preference and after exhausting the assets in paying claims in the proper order he is sued for the nonpayment of a claim of an inferior class.[85] It is not a good plea where it does not answer the declaration or raise any material issue,[86] and where a judgment is rendered against the principal in an action suggesting a devastavit it is conclusive that he had assets and wasted them and neither he nor the sureties can thereafter plead plene administravit in an action on the bond.[87] A plea of plene administravit must state the time when the administrator was without assets to satisfy the demand in question and should allege that he did not have such assets at the time of the issuing of the original writ or at any time thereafter.[88] Where the plea of plene administravit is no longer in use, the facts necessary to show that the estate has been fully administered may be set up in the answer.[89]

[§ 2644] (d) Want of Assets. While, in an action on an administrator's bond, because of failure of the administrator to pay judgments rendered against him, the sureties have a legal right to plead a want of assets, a plea is defective which avers only a want of sufficient assets.[90]

[§ 2645] (e) Nil Debet. A plea of nil debet in an action on an administration bond where breaches are assigned is bad on demurrer,[91] the breaches assigned being in the nature of several causes of action to which defendant should respond;[92] but the plea is not a nullity, and if issue is taken thereon it is incumbent upon plaintiff to prove all the material allegations of his declaration except the execution of the bond.[93]

[§ 2646] (f) Non Est Factum. The plea of non est factum puts in issue only the execution of the bond,[94] which, however, includes delivery as well as signing.[95] It admits every other allegation in the declaration,[96] and is a waiver of any legal defense of which defendant could have availed himself under the condition.[97]

[§ 2647] (g) Pleas in Abatement. Where leave to sue is a condition precedent to suit on the bond, an objection that suit was brought without such leave can be taken only by a plea in abatement,[98] and if not so taken it will be deemed to be waived.[99] The fact that the action is brought by a married woman alone without joining her husband can be taken advantage of only by a plea in abatement.[1]

1. Probate Ct. v. Sawyer, 59 Vt. 57, 7 A 281.

[§ 2648] (3) Severance in Pleading. In an action on the bond against both principal and sureties defendants need not plead jointly but may sever and each plead as many pleas as he may deem necessary to his defense.[2]

[§ 2649] c. Affidavit of Defense. An affidavit of defense, in an action against the surety on an administrator's bond, sixteen years after the audit of the administrator's account, averring that the surety is informed, believes, and expects to be able to prove that the claim for which the action is brought has been paid in full by the administrator, but that he cannot state the time, place, and manner of such settlement, because it was secretly had between plaintiff and the administrator, is sufficient under the rule that all that may be required of the surety is that his averments shall be as explicit and specific as the circumstances reasonably admit.[3]

[§ 2650] d. Replication or Reply. In modern practice breaches are usually assigned in the declaration and issue joined on the plea,[4] but if not and defendant pleads performance the specific breaches must be assigned in the replication.[5] Where defendant pleads performance the replication must state facts sufficient to show a breach of condition.[6] The replication in such cases performs the office of a declaration,[7] and there must be the same certainty of averment as would be necessary in the declaration.[8]

[§ 2651] e. Rejoinder and Surrejoinder. The rejoinder to be sufficient must answer the whole cause of action set out in the replication,[9] and must support the plea, any departure therefrom being ground for demurrer.[10] If plaintiff files a surrejoinder, it must conform to the replication, and if it sets up another and different breach from the one therein assigned it is bad for departure.[11]

[§ 2652] f. Amendments. Where the action must be instituted in the name of the state or other nominal plaintiff,[12] the complaint may be amended so as to substitute the proper nominal plaintiff where the action is improperly brought in the name of the real party in interest,[13] and if brought by the proper nominal plaintiff but for the benefit of the wrong person the record may be amended to show the real party in interest.[14] But any amendment must be consistent with the original pleading, and cannot be allowed where it would constitute a new suit against new parties.[15]

[§ 2653] 9. Issues, Proof, and Variance. There can be no recovery except upon the issues raised by the pleadings.[16] The proof must establish the cause of action as alleged,[17] and must show a compliance with any conditions precedent essential to the maintenance of the action;[18] but all material averments in the declaration not denied or controverted by the plea are admitted, and plaintiff need not introduce proof of matters not put in issue by the pleadings.[19] Where, under the statute, the sureties cannot be sued without joining the administrator, save in certain excepted instances, and plaintiff, for the purpose of bringing the case within the exception, alleges that the administrator has absconded and removed from the state, which allegation is denied, it is incumbent on plaintiff to prove such allegation, failing in which he is not entitled to a verdict.[20] The proof must correspond to the allegations of the pleadings,[21] but an immaterial variance may be disregarded,[22] and will be considered as waived if not objected to on the trial.[23] Under the general issue defendant may show that the person on whose estate the letters of administration were granted was not in fact dead, and that the court was therefore without jurisdiction.[24] In a proceeding by an administrator de bonis non against the sureties on the bond of the former administratrix for an accounting of the property received by her, where the parties acquiesced in the theory of the trial that, although a distribution was prematurely made, it was made to the heir, and therefore the sureties should be held only for the amount necessary to pay the debts and expenses of administration, there was a waiver by the administrator of an accounting of the whole estate.[25]

[§ 2654] 10. Evidence—a. Presumptions. It will be presumed in an action on an administration bond that the representative has performed the duties of his office according to law,[26] that where sales were made on credit good security was taken,[27] and after a reasonable time that the amount was duly collected.[28] Where the representative acted in different capacities with regard to property of the estate it will be presumed to have been in his hands in that capacity in which it ought at the time to have been held,[29] and, where he received property of the estate under an agreement to take administration, it will be presumed that he retained possession thereof until after his appointment.[30] Where a representative is cited to file a final account it will be presumed, in an action for failing to obey the order, that accounts previously filed were not final, although they were so styled.[31] It will be presumed that the order requiring the bond was authorized,[32] and the possession and approval of such bond by the probate judge raises the presumption that it was duly executed and delivered,[33] although it has been held that there is no such presumption where there is a plea of non est factum and it is claimed that the signature of one of the sureties is forged.[34] In the absence of any allegation to the contrary it is to be presumed that, in making certain payments, the representative acted within his lawful authority.[35] Failure of an administrator to account when called upon to do so raises a presumption of misappropriation of assets.[36] It has been held that in an action on the bond to compel the administrator to account for and pay over the amount of a debt from himself to decedent, the lapse of twenty years from the date of the bond affords no ground for a presumption of payment to the heirs,[37] and no presumption arises that the debt was forgiven by decedent.[38] A defalcation by the representative is presumed to have occurred while the bond was in effect.[39]

[§ 2655] b. Burden of Proof. In an action on the bond to recover damages for any act of maladministration, the burden is upon plaintiff to prove the damages alleged,[40] and also to show that at the time of the alleged default the principal was acting in his representative capacity.[41] A distributee suing for the nonpayment of his distributive share has the burden of proving that he is a person entitled to distribution[42] and also that he is entitled to the particular amount which he claims.[43] One who sues as a creditor of the estate must show that there was an existing debt of the estate to him at the time when his action was commenced.[44] A claimant suing for the nonpayment of his claim must show a receipt of assets by the representative,[45] unless, the executor being the residuary legatee, the bond is conditioned to pay all debts and legacies.[46] Where receipt of assets is proved or admitted the burden is on defendant to show that the assets were properly disposed of.[47] Where a representative has failed to collect debts due the estate he has the burden of showing that the failure was unavoidable,[48] and also that he exercised due care and diligence in the attempt to collect.[49]

[§ 2656] c. Admissibility. In actions on administration bonds whatever is competent as evidence upon which to charge the principal is admissible against the sureties,[50] but as in other cases evidence is not admissible unless it tends to support or contradict some allegation of the pleadings,[51] and to prove or disprove the particular fact in issue,[52] and the best evidence of the particular fact in question must be produced.[53] Evidence of the receipt of sums of money as income from the personal estate and of any property which at any time has come or ought to have come into the representative's hands is admissible against both him and the sureties.[54] In an action for the nonpayment of a legacy the will of decedent is admissible as evidence of plaintiff's right of action,[55] and in an action for failure to pay the amount allowed for the support of minor heirs where defendants set up as a defense that no notice was given the representative to appear before the commissioners it is competent to show by parol, as evidence of a waiver of notice, that the representative was present and consented to or aided in the commissioner's report.[56] Where defendant pleads that the bond as originally executed was in a sum different from and smaller than that sued on, evidence is admissible to show that he knew the value of the estate and that the bond was required to be in double that value.[57]

[b] A certified copy of the bond is by statute admissible as evidence. Peo. v. Lott, 27 Ill. 215.

[c] Where bonds are required to remain on file in the office where

The inventory and accounts filed by the representative are admissible to show for what property he and the sureties on the bond are liable,[58] but an account showing that the assets of the estate have been exhausted in payment of charges and preferred claims has been held not admissible,[59] unless allowed by the probate court.[60]

Value of property sold at unauthorized sale. Where an administrator has made an unauthorized sale of property of the estate, evidence of the price received is admissible to show the value of the property converted.[61] In an action for damages resulting from selling stock belonging to the estate at private sale without order of the probate court, defendant may show what the market value of the stock was up to the delivery to the purchaser and the exceptional circumstances under which it advanced and the conditions under which he agreed to sell it for the price received as evidence of his good faith, prudence, and skill in selling it.[62] In such a case evidence of individual offers to buy and sales of the stock, being admissible to show market value, is competent on the issue as to whether the administrator acted with prudence and skill,[63] but secret sales of corporate stock at extraordinary prices paid by rival interests seeking to obtain control of the corporation do not establish market value, and therefore evidence thereof is not competent.[64] The judgment and conduct of distributees in directing an administrator to sell stock belonging to the estate at private sale without order of the probate court may be considered in passing upon his prudence and skill in selling it.[65]

The representative's report of a sale is not conclusive as to the price but parol evidence is admissible to show the amount actually received.[66]

Payment, performance, or other exoneration. In an action against the sureties to recover the amount of a decree any evidence tending to show that plaintiff has received payment in whole or in part out of the assets of the estate of the principal debtor is admissible;[67] and, in an action on the bond of an administrator whose letters have been revoked, evidence of proper payments made by him and of losses of money by theft should be admitted in exoneration of his liability.[68] On a writ of scire facias, brought under a statute authorizing the court, on a suggestion of waste by a judgment creditor, to issue a writ of scire facias against the executor, because of a recovery of judgment against the executor, who had executed a bond conditioned for the payment of debts, and a return of execution unsatisfied, the executor may show that the assets of the estate were properly administered.[69]

Insolvency of estate. The representative's report of probable insolvency of the estate is not admissible unless supplemented by the report of the commissioner to determine solvency and the decree thereon.[70]

Insolvency of representative. Evidence that the executors were insolvent two and one-half years or more after they took charge of the estate is not admissible.[71]

Judgment or decree against principal. A judgment or decree against the principal is admissible in an action against the sureties.[72]

[a] A decree on a settlement by the representative of a deceased principal to which the sureties were not parties is not admissible to show a liability of their principal for which they are responsible. Means v. Hicks,

[§ 2657] d. Weight and Sufficiency. The usual rules as to the weight and sufficiency of evidence[73] apply in an action on an administration bond.[74] The inventory filed by a representative, although not conclusive, is prima facie evidence of the assets received and their value,[75] but the return of appraisers where the representative has no right or opportunity to object to the return on the ground of a deficiency of assets is not evidence to charge him with assets,[76] unless by his conduct he has adopted the appraisement as his inventory.[77] The representative's accounts are prima facie evidence in an action on the bond.[78] Where the penalty of the bond is required to be fixed according to the appraisal of the estate, the sum expressed therein is prima facie evidence of the value of the property for which the representative is responsible.[79] Since the representative is lawfully in possession of the assets proof of the failure to pay a claim against the estate on demand is not sufficient to show conversion;[80] but a creditor who proves a debt against the estate and a devastavit or misapplication of assets is prima facie entitled to recover,[81] and need not show that there are no other assets from which his claim will ultimately be paid.[82] Proof of a sale of property the price of which was lost because insufficient security was taken is prima facie evidence of a devastavit.[83] The final settlement of a representative in which certain persons are designated as the heirs entitled to distribution is sufficient proof of the fact that the persons so named are heirs.[84] The effect of judgments and decrees against the principal as evidence against the sureties in an action on the bond has already been discussed.[85] At common law a judgment at law against the principal establishing a claim against the estate was an admission of assets sufficient to pay the same,[86] and a return of nulla bona on an execution issued thereon established a devastavit;[87] but in most jurisdictions the law is now otherwise and the judgment is not an admission of assets,[88] nor is the return of execution unsatisfied sufficient to establish a devastavit.[89] However, a return of nulla bona on an execution on a judgment against the representative in his capacity as such makes out a prima facie case for plaintiff suing on the bond,[90] and where an administrator's account shows a balance in his hands, a return of nulla bona is sufficient evidence of a devastavit.[91] So also proof of the solvency of a decedent's estate and of the sufficiency of assets in the hands of the administrator to pay a debt against the estate, with returns of "No property" on executions issued on a judgment against the administrator, to be levied out of the goods of the intestate, concludes the surety on the administrator's bond on the issue of devastavit vel non, and fixes the surety's liability for the debt.[92] Where the breach assigned is that the administrator failed to account for assets and converted the same to his own use, and the general issue is pleaded, proof merely that assets came to the hands of the administrator does not make out a prima facie case;[93] but evidence that the administrator received assets and after his removal failed and refused on demand to deliver them to his successor establishes a prima facie liability on the bond.[94] Where an administrator had converted the interest of certain nonresident minors in the estate prior to his being appointed as their guardian in a foreign jurisdiction, and in an action on his bond as administrator testified that he held the fund as administrator, his sworn account as guardian, not shown to have been allowed or acted on by the court, in which he charged himself with the interest of the minors as received from himself as administrator, was properly limited to its effect as contradicting his testimony that he still held the funds as administrator.[95] A showing that, shortly after withdrawing odd sums of money, the same sums were applied to the personal obligations of the executor, although he had coöbligors, justifies a finding that funds of the estate were used by the executor to pay his individual debts.[96]

[d] As against the administrators or a surety, a judgment against the principal is not admissible. Nicholson v. Carr, 3 Blackf. (Ind.) 104.

[e] In North Carolina (1) a judgment against the principal is not admissible in evidence in an action against the sureties (Governor v. Carter, 25 N. C. 338; Washington County Ct. v. Harramond, 11 N. C. 339; Mecklenburg County Ct. v. Clark, 11 N. C. 43), and (2) conversely a judgment in his favor is not admissible in favor of the sureties (Governor v. Carter, 25 N. C. 338).

[§ 2658] 11. Trial—a. Questions for Jury. In an action of debt on an administration bond it is error to render final judgment without the intervention of a jury.[97] Where a representative may in his discretion make sales on credit, whether he has abused his discretion in so doing is a question of fact for the jury.[98] After verdict in an action upon a probate bond for the penal sum thereof, it is discretionary with the court, upon a hearing in equity, to fix the amount for which execution shall be awarded or to submit the question to a jury.[99]

[§ 2659] b. Instructions. In an action on an administration bond the court must correctly instruct the jury as to the nature of defendant's liability;[1] and where the court submits to the jury an erroneous and misleading test of defendant's liability, it is not necessary in order to entitle defendant to take advantage of the error that he should have discovered it and asked for further instructions.[2]

[§ 2660] c. Verdict and Findings. In an action for a devastavit, although the sureties can only be charged to the extent of the assets actually wasted, the verdict of the jury need not ascertain the exact amount of the devastavit,[3] but where defendant pleads plene administravit in an action for failing to pay a claim against the estate the verdict must find that defendant had assets sufficient to satisfy the demand or the value of the assets if they were not sufficient.[4] Where the proof is clear, a verdict may be directed.[5] A finding that the representative had not committed any willful breach of the bond is not inconsistent with a finding of breach by mismanagement and waste.[6]

[§ 2661] d. Reference or Arbitration. Where the bond is given to a judge of probate, he is merely a trustee of the bond for the benefit of the persons interested in the estate and he cannot submit their rights under it to reference or arbitration;[7] but where, in an action on the bond, it is admitted or proved that there came into the hands of the representative assets belonging to the estate it is proper to order a reference to take an account of his administration of the same,[8] unless some defense is interposed which bars the right to such account.[9]

[§ 2662] 12. Judgment.[10] In some jurisdictions the rule is that for breach of an administration bond there can be only one judgment,[11] which judgment is for the whole penalty of the bond.[12] Such a judgment is not for the exclusive benefit of the person by whom the action is instituted,[13] but it stands as security for all who may be interested therein,[14] whether such persons were named in the original suit or not.[15] The judgment also stands as security for subsequent acts of maladministration.[16] In other jurisdictions the judgment need not be for the full penalty of the bond but only for the damages which the party suing has sustained,[17] and such a judgment will not bar another action on the bond, but suits may continue to be prosecuted thereon until the whole amount of the penalty is finally recovered.[18] Actions on the bond are not against the representative in his representative capacity and the judgment must be de bonis propriis.[19] In a proceeding by an administrator de bonis non against the sureties on the bond of the former administratrix to settle her account, it has been held error to direct a judgment against the sureties for the amount necessary to pay the debts of the estate, the probate court not having general equitable jurisdiction with power to grant full relief, but only such as relates to the administration of the estate.[20]

Amendment. A judgment which is merely irregular and not void may be amended.[21]

The judgment becomes a lien upon the representative's land,[22] or upon land purchased by him with funds belonging to the estate and fraudulently conveyed.[23]

[§ 2663] 13. Execution and Enforcement of Judgment—a. In General. In an action against principal and sureties, the sureties have a right to an order directing that execution be first levied on the property of the principal.[24] The recovery where suit is instituted for the general benefit is to be treated as assets of the estate and distributed accordingly.[25]

[§ 2664] b. Judgment for Full Penalty of Bond. Although judgment is entered for the full penalty of the bond execution does not issue for this amount, but only for the damages assessed for the breaches assigned.[26] Persons interested may be entitled to execution on the judgment, although their claims were not perfected at the time the suit was brought,[27] or even when the judgment was rendered,[28] and any person interested may sue out a scire facias and have execution thereon,[29] whether named in the original writ or not.[30] Where breaches occur subsequently to the rendition of the original judgment, persons injured thereby may sue out a scire facias on the judgment and have their damages assessed as in the original suit,[31] no other judgment being necessary than the usual one on a scire facias of an award of execution.[32] Unless required by statute the writ need not expressly state that plaintiff is an heir, creditor, or legatee, it being sufficient if it appears that he is a person interested in the bond or the judgment rendered thereon.[33] On a second scire facias to have a further execution of a judgment for the penalty of the bond a plea of payment of the penalty must show that such payment was pursuant to a decree of the probate court or a judgment at law or was otherwise compulsory against defendants.[34]

[§ 2665] 14. Damages—a. In General. Whenever a breach of the conditions of the bond is shown the recovery of damages follows as a matter of course.[35] The measure of damages is the loss actually sustained by the breach complained of[36] unless otherwise provided by statute;[37] and where plaintiff shows a breach of condition but fails to show any special damages resulting therefrom, he can recover only nominal damages.[38] So, it has been held that only nominal damages are recoverable for a failure to account,[39] but it has also been considered that at least nominal damages can be recovered for such a breach,[40] and that a statutory penalty for failure to account is recoverable for by action on the bond.[41] Where property of the estate is lost through the neglect or misconduct of the representative, the measure of damages is the value of the property.[42] In an action for failing to include certain property in the inventory the rule of damages is a sum not exceeding the value of the property omitted,[43] and in an action for failing to pay creditors the damages are limited to the value of the assets which should be in the hands of the representative.[44] In an action of debt where judgment is rendered for the penalty of the bond the recovery is not limited to the damages laid in the declaration,[45] and, in assessing the damages after a breach has been established and judgment for the penalty rendered, matters may be considered in mitigation of the damages which would not amount to a legal defense to the breach.[46] The fact that the executor is a beneficiary under the will does not preclude a full recovery in an action on the bond by other beneficiaries, where no final order has been made settling or distributing the estate.[47]

The amount for which the sureties may be held liable is always measured by the liability of the principal.[48] The value of assets received, or which should have been collected in the exercise of proper diligence, is the utmost for which the sureties can be held liable,[49] and their liability is also subject to the limitation that it cannot exceed the penalty of the bond,[50] unless, in some jurisdictions, where the excess is due to a recovery of interest.[51] The sureties are not entitled to credit for attorney's fees, expenses, and for extraordinary services to which the administrator never made claim in the probate court, the sureties' right to subrogation with reference to such claims, if any, being enforceable only by petition in the probate court.[52]

Expenses incurred by reason of breach. The damages recoverable include not only the equivalent of assets lost but also the costs and reasonable attorneys' fees of the proceedings for the removal of the unfaithful or negligent administrator;[53] and it has been held that they include also attorneys' fees incurred and paid in the action on the bond itself,[54] although this has been denied.[55] The defendants cannot be held liable for the services and expenses of the new administrator in completing the settlement of the estate, such expenses not being damages caused by the neglect or maladministration of the former representative.[56] The right of a surviving executor to recover from the sureties of a deceased coexecutor funds of the estate received and unaccounted for by the coexecutor does not entitle the surviving executor to recover the costs of an action brought against him by the heir to compel him to make good the default of the coexecutor.[57]

[§ 2666] b. Interest. Interest is ordinarily allowable as an element of plaintiff's damages,[58] but only simple interest can be recovered.[59]

Interest in excess of penalty. As in the case of other bonds,[60] there is a divergence of opinion as to whether interest can be allowed in an action on an administration bond to an extent which increases the total recovery to a sum in excess of the penalty, such an allowance being held proper in some jurisdictions[61] while in others it is held that the wasted, less the commissions that the executor or administrator would have earned but for the misconduct or neglect. McKim v. Hibbard, 142 Mass. 422, 8 NE 152.

[a] Where partial payments have been made on a judgment against an executor or administrator and an action on the bond is brought for the nonpayment of the balance, the partial payments should be first applied to keep down the interest and the interest computed on the balance remaining after each payment. Fay v. Bradley, 1 Pick. (Mass.) 194.

[b] In an action for failing to pay over a balance to a successor in office, interest may be allowed from the time payment was demanded until the rendition of judgment. Webb v. Roetinger, 12 Oh. Cir. Ct. 730, 4 Oh. Cir. Dec. 270.

[c] The fact that the complaint does not contain a demand for interest does not preclude the court from awarding interest if the facts justify it. Rutenic v. Hamakar, 40 Or. 444, 67 P 196.

[d] Necessity for demand.—Plaintiff, suing to establish a right to a share of the estate, is not entitled to interest from the date of distribution, where distribution was made to other persons in the bona fide belief that they, and not plaintiff, were entitled to what was paid over, and plaintiff made no demand until the commencement of the action. State v. Lust, (Mo. A.) 197 SW 172.

[a] The reason for this rule is that, where the whole penalty has be-penalty of the bond is the utmost that can be recovered, even though this precludes a full allowance of interest.[62] Of course the judgment rendered in an action on the bond, like any other judgment,[63] bears interest, regardless of whether or not this increases the total liability beyond the penalty.[64]

[§ 2669] 17. Equitable Relief against Judgment. Where a representative having matters proper for a defense to an action on the bond neglects to make it, equity will not ordinarily relieve against the judgment;[78] nor are the mistakes or negligence of counsel in the conduct of a defense a sufficient ground for relief.[79] But where, in a suit on an administration bond for the benefit of distributees, two of whom were the administrators, judgment was recovered for the whole amount of the inventory against the executors of the surety alone, and on a bill to enjoin the judgment it appeared by an ex parte settlement of the administrators in the county court that a considerable part of the estate had been bona fide disbursed by them, and partly to some of the distributees, relief was granted, although no defense had been made at law.[80]

XVII. FOREIGN AND ANCILLARY ADMINISTRATION

[§ 2670] A. Appointment—1. Foreign Appointment—a. In General. The phrase "foreign representative" does not refer to the mere nonresidence of the individual holding the office but to the foreign origin of the representative character.[81] So if a representative appointed in one jurisdiction takes out ancillary letters of administration in another, he thereupon becomes a domestic representative within that jurisdiction.[82]

[§ 2671] b. Extent of Authority Conferred. Letters testamentary or of administration have no extraterritorial force and confer no authority upon the representative to administer upon property outside of the state or county of his appointment,[83] come a debt which the obligors unjustly detain, the recovery may be for the entire amount of the penalty with interest thereon for the time so detained. Probate Judge v. Heydock, 8 N. H. 491.

[b] Interest from the date of the writ, on the penal sum of the bond, may be allowed. Bassett v. Maryland Fidelity, etc., Co., 184 Mass. 210, 68 NE 205, 100 AmSR 552.

and in the absence of statute any recognition which the representative may receive outside of the jurisdiction of his appointment is due solely to the principle of comity,[84] and each state or country may extend or withhold such recognition according to its own pleasure and policy.[85] No state will recognize a foreign representative to the prejudice of its own citizens,[86] as where such recognition would conflict with the rights of local creditors[87] or a local administration;[88] but in the absence of such circumstances the tendency of the modern authorities is to recognize a foreign representative for many purposes,[89] although of course he will not be permitted through comity to exercise powers which he could not exercise in the state of his appointment.[90]

[§ 2672] c. Statutory Provisions. In a number of jurisdictions the statutes authorize a foreign representative to sue,[91] or be sued,[92] or upon complying with certain conditions to act as a local representative;[93] but any conditions provided for by these statutes must be substantially complied with before a foreign representative will be recognized.[94]

[§ 2673] 2. Ancillary Appointment—a. Ancillary and Domiciliary Appointment Distinguished. The right of granting administration is not confined to the state or country in which decedent last dwelt, but it is very common and often necessary for administration to be taken out elsewhere.[95] Where different administrations are granted in different jurisdictions, that which is granted in the jurisdiction of decedent's last domicile is termed the principal or domiciliary administration, and any other administration granted in any other state or country is termed "ancillary,"[96] and this without regard to which is granted first.[97] The term "ancillary" serves only to distinguish one administration from the other,[98] and the ancillary administration is not dependent upon the domiciliary;[99] but each is distinct and separate,[1] and may properly be considered as a principal one with reference to the limits of its exclusive authority,[2] for the ancillary administrator becomes invested with the same powers and is subject to the same liability with respect to the assets within the jurisdiction of his appointment as other administrators,[3] although the ancillary administration is in a sense subordinate to that of the domicile.[4]

Where different persons are appointed executors in different states, each in respect to the property of the testator in that state, neither administration is in a proper sense ancillary to the other, because the executors in both states derive their title from the will and not from the letters issued to them.[5]

"When a person dies intestate, owning personal property in the country of his domicile as well as in a foreign country, administration is had in both countries. The administration taken out in the country in which intestate resided is called the domiciliary or principal administration. It is the duty of such an administrator to collect the assets of the estate, pay the debts, if any are due, and distribute the remainder among the distributees of the intestate. The administration in the foreign country is called auxiliary or ancillary, and the duty of such an administrator is to collect the assets of the estate, and pay the debts due by intestate, especially debts due to citizens of that country. Each country claims and exercises the right to see that debts due to its citizens are paid before the assets of the estate are taken out of its jurisdiction. After the debts are satisfied, the ancillary administrator, under the law of nations, resting upon comity and broad principles of justice, may transmit the residuum to the administrator of the domicile, to be there disposed of according to the law of the domicile." ger of being wasted or lost,[7] or debts owing to him which must be collected by suit,[8] or where there are provisions of his will to be carried out with respect to property in such jurisdiction.[9] In most cases where a decedent leaves property in different jurisdictions, an ancillary administration is not only proper but necessary,[10] since the domiciliary letters have no extraterritorial force,[11] and the principal representative cannot, in the absence of statute, sue to collect assets outside of the jurisdiction of his appointment.[12] The chief object, however, of an ancillary administration is to collect and preserve local assets for the benefit of local creditors,[13] and it is sometimes considered that, if there are no local creditors, a grant of administration on the estate, situate within the state, of a nonresident decedent, must be deemed original and not ancillary.[14] Probate or establishment of a will in the foreign country, or probate thereof in the state or territory, where it was executed or where testator resided at the time of his death sometimes authorizes, under statute, the recording of the will and the foreign letters, and the issuance of ancillary letters.[15]

In effect, the situation is the same as though two wills of the same testatrix, made at different dates, had been probated, one in Michigan and one here. . . . I do not think the framers of the Code contemplated a case like this. It is an anomalous situation. Ancillary letters would be inconsistent with and a contradiction of the will and codicil in force in this state. If not, they would mean nothing. The New York decree having precedence, no property in this state would be administered under the ancillary letters and thus the very purpose for which such letters are granted would fail. There are no debts of the estate unpaid in this state, and, if there were, they would be provided for under the principal administration now in force in this state. To grant them (ancillary letters) might conform to the letter of the Code but it would violate its spirit and be an idle ceremony. It would, indeed, be worse than that, for it would violate the legal adjudications made in regard to this very estate. Ancillary letters presuppose something which, in this case, does not exist, viz.: a superior or dominant administration in some other state." application is unadministered,[17] and also that it is of such a character as may be denominated local assets, or such as has its situs for purposes of administration in that jurisdiction.[18] It is usually held that property brought into the jurisdiction after decedent's death is sufficient ground for granting ancillary administration, although he owned no property there at the time of his death,[19] but the circumstances or purposes under or for which the property was brought into the state are more or less influential, and sometimes furnish grounds for refusing to grant administration on such property,[20] and there is authority for the view that the bringing of property into the jurisdiction after the death of decedent is never sufficient to warrant ancillary administration.[21] After property has vested in a representative in one jurisdiction, its removal into another is no ground for granting ancillary administration there,[22] and the representative may sue in his own name for its recovery;[23] but where a debtor moves in another jurisdiction the debt becomes assets in that jurisdiction.[24] Ancillary administration may be granted, although decedent left only real property in the jurisdiction where the grant is applied for,[25] when by the local law the real property of decedents passes to their personal representatives, or there are local creditors who are entitled to have the land sold for payment of their debts;[26] but in the absence of such conditions the existence of real property within the

After the claim had been collected, and before the proceeds had been paid over to the administrator, an application was made by the creditors of decedent in Pennsylvania for the appointment of a local administrator. It was held that the fund so received by the agent did not constitute assets in Pennsylvania on which administration could be granted, because the claim against the government was a local asset in the jurisdiction of decedent's domicile, and the mere fact that it had been paid by the government to the agent of the administrator in Pennsylvania, for the express purpose of remitting to the administrator the balance remaining after deducting the amount of the agent's compensation, did not invest it with any of the attributes of a Pennsylvania asset. jurisdiction is not sufficient.[27]

[§ 2676] (3) Dependence on Domiciliary Appointment. While ancillary administration is not generally granted until after a representative has been appointed in the place of decedent's domicile,[28] jurisdiction to grant ancillary letters is in no way dependent upon a prior domiciliary grant,[29] nor is it affected by the fact that a domiciliary grant has been made and that the foreign representative is by statute authorized to sue.[30]

[b] Refusal of domiciliary letters to one executor.—Where a will devising real property in Minnesota and admitted to probate in a foreign country is allowed in the probate court of the proper county in Minnesota, it becomes the duty of the court to issue letters testamentary to a resident executor named in the will if duly qualified, although such letters were refused him by the court where the will was originally proved. quiring that the person to whom letters are issued shall be a resident of the state.[35] In cases where no domiciliary letters have been granted, the ancillary letters will ordinarily be issued to the person who would be entitled thereto, under the local statutes, in case of domestic administration,[36] and if those entitled to preference do not apply, administration may be granted in the discretion of the court.[37] The domiciliary representative is under no legal obligation to take out ancillary letters,[38] but may renounce his right to the ancillary appointment,[39] and the court may appoint some other suitable person on his failure or refusal to act[40] or in case of his death.[41] An executor who resigns in the state of the domiciliary administration, without stating that he resigns in that state only, and whose subsequent acts show that he intends to have nothing to do with the estate, is not entitled to ancillary letters in another state.[42]

[§ 2678] d. Time for Appointment.[43] Statutes limiting the time for taking out original letters of administration[44] have been held to apply[45] and not to apply[46] to ancillary administration. Each case must be governed by its own facts and circumstances, and where the delay is sufficiently explained, the court may grant such letters at any time.[47] The right to ancillary letters may be renounced, however, by delay in making application therefor,[48] and where a person who would be entitled to ancillary letters fails to make application therefor until after the domiciliary representative has taken possession of and administered all the assets, he will be deemed to have waived his right to such administration.[49]

[§ 2679] e. Proceedings for Appointment. Ancillary administration is a special proceeding.[50] Proceedings for the appointment of an ancillary administrator are instituted by a petition[51] by a person entitled to appointment,[52] addressed to the probate court,[53] which should contain a statement of facts sufficient to show the jurisdiction of the court in the particular case,[54] and show the names and residences of creditors, or persons claiming as creditors, who reside within the state.[55] The petition should be verified.[56] Only creditors need be cited on an application to record a will of personal property executed by a nonresident and to issue ancillary letters testamentary thereon,[57] but decedent's next of kin may intervene and question the jurisdiction of the court to issue letters.[58] In the case of a testator who died while a resident of a foreign country, an ancillary appointment is made on behalf of the estate and the legatees, and not on behalf of the foreign executor, and cannot be conditioned on the foreign executor returning to the state money which he took therefrom.[59]

Copies of will and domiciliary letters. Appeal. The domiciliary representative has such an interest as entitles him to appeal from a decree appointing an ancillary representative in another jurisdiction;[63] and other persons interested in the estate have the same right.[64]

[§ 2680] f. Bond. An ancillary representative is usually required by statute to give a bond in the jurisdiction where his letters are taken out,[65] but the failure to file a bond renders the letters voidable only and not void.[66]

[§ 2681] g. Operation and Effect of Appointment. An ancillary representative is an officer of the jurisdiction where he is appointed,[67] and has the same general powers as a domestic executor or administrator except in the disposing of decedent's real property for the payment of debts and funeral expenses.[68] The appointment is a decree in rem which is binding on decedent's next of kin,[69] and is conclusive of the right of the appointee to act as such.[70] Where an executor and trustee in one state is appointed ancillary executor in another state, such appointment does not give the court of the latter state jurisdiction over the executor in his capacity as trustee, but the management of the estate in that respect remains with the court by which the first appointment was made.[71] An erroneous statement in an application for letters of ancillary administration, not knowingly or willfully made, but based upon a misconception as to the effect of the laws of the state of the domicile of the decedent, does not render the ancillary appointment invalid.[72] The fact that there is nothing to warrant an order authorizing an ancillary administrator, appointed to collect debts, to take charge of real property in the state, renders such order subject to attack on motion, but the invalidity of the same has no effect on the grant of the letters.[73] The appointment of an ancillary representative cannot be collaterally attacked,[74] except on the ground of lack of jurisdiction,[75] but it has been considered that the question of the existence of facts making the appointment proper is a matter going to the jurisdiction to appoint.[76]

[§ 2682] h. Revocation of Letters; Removal. The court having power to grant ancillary letters has also the right to revoke such letters where they have been improvidently granted.[77] The letters may be revoked where they have been procured through fraud,[78] and, where general ancillary letters have been granted and it appears that decedent left a will, they may be revoked and letters with the will annexed issued;[79] but the probate of a foreign will does not of itself annul the ancillary letters previ-

[a] Circumstances not showing fraud.—An omission of a petition for ancillary letters on the estate of a resident of a foreign country to state that an application for probate of the will had been made in this country did not constitute concealment of facts, so as to warrant revocation of letters, where the court had before it, at the time of granting such letters, a former appointment of petitioner as ancillary executor, reciting such fact. ously granted,[80] nor are ancillary letters of administration revoked by a subsequent grant of letters testamentary in the state of the testator's domicile.[81] An ancillary representative may also be removed for misconduct.[82] The power of the court to revoke ancillary letters is not arbitrary, but is a legal discretion to be exercised only upon a state of facts warranting it.[83] A petition for the removal of an ancillary representative can be presented only by a person interested in the estate,[84] and must make a specific allegation of facts showing sufficient cause for removal.[85] It has been held that the revocation of the domiciliary letters does not affect ancillary letters taken out in another jurisdiction,[86] although there is also authority for the contrary view where the domiciliary representative is also the ancillary representative.[87] It has also been held that where a domiciliary executor has also been appointed ancillary executor, his removal by the domiciliary court did not as a matter of law require the granting of an application for his removal as ancillary executor.[88]

[c] Unauthorized probate of will. —The surrogate is authorized to vacate ancillary administration based on the probate of a will in a foreign country of which decedent was not a resident. In re Connell, 138 NYS 389.

[d] When revocation properly denied.—Decedent dying in Germany, an administrator was appointed there, and alleged ancillary letters of administration were issued in New York to petitioner for the reduction to possession of a legacy due decedent under the will of her father, who died in that state, petitioner giving no bond. Subsequently respondent, decedent's sister, was granted letters of administration, and in an accounting proceeding, to which petitioner and respondent were parties, the legacy was awarded to her, petitioner taking no appeal from the decree. It was held that, the legacy being the only subject of administration within the jurisdiction of the court and petitioner having waived his right to it by failing to appeal from the decree awarding it to respondent, the supreme court would not interfere with a decree denying petitioner's application for the revocation of respondent's letters of administration. [a] A distinction (1) has been made between judgments recovered against ancillary administrators on claims filed after the death of the decedent, and judgments recovered in actions pending against decedent at the time of his death. Thus, where the same person was appointed administrator at the domicile of the decedent, and afterward in another state in which an action against decedent was at issue and pending at the time of his death, it was held that, inasmuch as the court had acquired jurisdiction of the sub-

an action against him.[92] It has been held that the rule applies even where the offices are held by the same person,[93] although this has been denied.[94]

Expenses of administration. Several administrations granted in different jurisdictions upon the same estate are each several and distinct, and have no common liability for expense incurred by each.[95]

Executors in different states are, as regards the creditors of the testator, in privity with each other, bearing to the creditors the same responsibilities as if there were only one executor.[96] And an administrator with the will annexed is, it is said, in legal contemplation, the executor of the will, so that there is the same privity between the executor of a will and an administrator with the will annexed in another jurisdiction, as exists between executors of the same will in different jurisdictions,[97] so that a judgment against the executor is enforceable against the administrator with the will annexed.[98]

ject matter of the suit, and had authority to revive the action against the administrator of the defendant and to hear and determine the rights of the parties, such judgment was conclusive as to the matters in issue, and that to require plaintiff, who had established his claim after tedious and expensive litigation in the ancillary jurisdiction, to go through the same process in the domiciliary jurisdiction would impose a burden on him not required by law. Creighton v. Murphy, 8 Nebr. 349, 1 NW 138. (2) But this distinction has been denied. Jones v. Jones, 15 Tex. 463, 465, 65 AmD 174 ("It is not perceived that it makes any difference that service was obtained upon the intestate in his lifetime, inasmuch as the suit was not prosecuted to judgment against him, but the judgment was recovered after his death, against an ancillary administrator appointed in that state, who represented the intestate only as to the assets within the jurisdiction where the appointment was conferred. The effect of the personal service upon the intestate died with the person, and the judgment recovered against the administrator had no other or greater effect than if it had been recovered in a suit originally instituted against him").

held to be limited to assets within the jurisdiction.[7] The title of the domiciliary representative is not, however, commensurate with that of the owner while living.[8] It will not authorize the representative to sue outside of the jurisdiction of his appointment,[9] or to interfere in any way with an ancillary administration;[10] but when there is no local administration, it is a title which other jurisdictions will recognize through comity,[11] which debtors of the estate in other jurisdictions may recognize and will be protected in recognizing,[12] and which will give validity to many acts of administration in other jurisdictions which can be performed without recourse to the courts.[13] Property of the estate coming from a foreign jurisdiction into that of the domicile immediately vests in the domiciliary representative,[14] provided administration has not previously been taken out in such foreign jurisdiction,[15] and when title to property has once vested in the domiciliary representative, it is not divested by the property being sent into another jurisdiction.[16] When an ancillary representative is appointed, his title, as to assets within the jurisdiction of his appointment, supersedes that of the domiciliary representative,[17] but the latter's title revests, as to the residue transmitted to the domicile, on such transmission.[18]

[§ 2686] C. Collection of Assets—1. Ancillary Representative. It is the duty of an ancillary representative to collect all the assets of the estate within the jurisdiction of his appointment,[19] and his right to do so is superior to that of a foreign domiciliary representative,[20] even though the foreign representative is authorized by statute to sue in the jurisdiction,[21] for even where such statutes exist, it remains the universal policy to preserve local assets for the satisfaction in the first instance of local claims.[22] A voluntary payment to the domiciliary representative will not bar a suit brought by the ancillary representative to recover the same debt,[23]

[b] If a foreign debtor voluntarily comes into the state for a temporary purpose, he may be there sued by an ancillary administrator appointed therein, if such administrator acts without intent to defraud the principal administration and the debt has not been paid or sued on in the state where the debtor resides. Fox v. Carr, 16 Hun (N. Y.) 434. Compare Klein v. French, 57 Miss. 662 (payment to the ancillary representative is good only where the debtor lives in the same state).

[c] Actions on life insurance policies.—(1) Money due on a policy of life insurance is generally considered as a debt due in the state where the insurance company has its habitat, and is to be recovered by a personal representative there appointed. But where the insured was domiciled and died in another state, having the policy in his possession at the time of his death, and it came into the hands of the domiciliary representative, he may recover on it if there is an agent of the company appointed in that state under its laws to receive a service of process against the company. In such cases the principle that a simple contract debt follows the person of the debtor is not invaded, because the debtor, the insurance company, is present by its agent so that the policy is assets in that state. [a] However, where a creditor promised to pay his debt to a foreign domiciliary representative before he had notice that a local ancillary appointment had been made but paid unless such payment was made prior to the appointment of the ancillary representative.[24] The ancillary representative, however, can collect only what is properly assets of his jurisdiction,[25] and statutes permitting a foreign representative to sue do not authorize him to sue for assets situated elsewhere,[26] nor will a voluntary payment to him by a debtor of another jurisdiction discharge the debt.[27] It has been held, however, that an ancillary administrator can, under a writ of foreign attachment founded on a simple contract debt, attach property within the state of a nonresident debtor to decedent.[28]

[§ 2687] 2. Domiciliary Representative. Letters of administration extend only to the assets in the jurisdiction where the letters are granted,[29] and do not confer as a matter of right any authority to collect assets in another.[30] But since a foreign domiciliary representative has a title to assets wherever situated which may be recognized in the absence of local creditors or a local administration,[31] he may under such circumstances take possession of property of the estate if he can do so peaceably and without suit,[32] and his possession will be recognized as rightful and protected as fully as if he had taken out local letters of administration.[33] He may also collect a debt due to the estate if voluntarily paid,[34] before the issuance of ancillary letters in the jurisdiction where the debt has its situs,[35] and such payment is usually held to be after such notice, the payment was held to be a good defense to an action by the ancillary representative. Weizell v. Cincinnati Sav. Inst., 1 Oh. Dec. (Reprint) 55, 1 WestLJ 393.

[a] Reason for rule.—"If residents of this State have in their possession property which belongs to a party domiciled abroad, or are indebted to him, they may of course recognize any valid title claimed under him, arising out of an act in pais, by testament or by succession upon intestacy, and may voluntarily deliver over the property or make payment of the debt. Our jurisdiction is not violated nor our tribunals in any respect contemned by such a transaction. Simply, our laws are not invoked because in the case supposed there is no occasion for their agency. If the property or money is thereupon taken by the new possessor into the foreign jurisdiction we have no further concern with the matter." Parsons v. Lyman, 20 N. Y. 103, 112, 18 HowPr 193.

a valid discharge of the debt,[36] and a protection against an action to collect the same debt by a domestic representative subsequently appointed,[37] although there is also authority for the contrary view.[38] Since debts due from the United States have no situs at the seat of government, they may be received by a domiciliary representative at any place where the government may choose to pay them.[39]

Where local suit on foreign debt possible. If a foreign debtor comes into the jurisdiction of the domiciliary representative, or owns property therein, the domiciliary representative may sue him there, notwithstanding the liability which may attach in consequence of an ancillary administration in the jurisdiction of the debtor's residence.[40] Not only has an executor or administrator the power in such cases to collect debts due from foreign debtors, but it is also held to be his duty to the extent of his conscious ability to do so, and the court of the domicile may compel him to account for willful neglect to perform that duty;[41] and he will be allowed the expenses of a bona fide but unsuccessful attempt to make the collection.[42]

[§ 2688] D. Disposition of Property—1. Personal Property—a. In General. Where a foreign domiciliary representative has taken possession of property of the estate, there being no local representative, he may sell it.[43] In such case the purchaser will acquire a title which through comity will be respected,[44] and he cannot be compelled to pay to an ancillary representative subsequently appointed any indebtedness on account of such purchase.[45] But a domiciliary representative cannot dispose of any property in another jurisdiction where a local administration is pending.[46]

[§ 2689] b. Choses in Action—(1) In General. Although a foreign representative cannot himself sue on a chose in action of his decedent,[47] his disability is a personal incapacity and not a defect of title,[48] and it is usually held that he may assign a chose in action so that the assignee may sue there-

"It is settled that the principal or domiciliary administrator may receive voluntary payment from, and even sue, a debtor residing in a foreign jurisdiction, if he shall voluntarily come within the State in which he is appointed. . . . It is also settled that, where there are no debts in the jurisdiction where a foreign debtor resides, and no ancillary administrator has been granted there, the principal administrator may, in such foreign State, receive a voluntary payment from the debtor, which will be a good acquittance to him, even if an ancillary administrator should be afterwards appointed. . . . And it is further settled that, if the principal administrator have possession of a note payable to his intestate or bearer, he may, as the lawful holder and bearer of such note, sue on it in a foreign jurisdiction." on in his own name,[49] provided the statutes of the state where the action is brought permit the assignee of a chose in action to sue in his own name.[50] The right so to assign choses in action has, however, been denied.[51]

[§ 2691] c. Corporate Stock. It is usually held that a domiciliary representative may assign shares of stock in a foreign corporation belonging to the estate,[57] and no local grant of administration is necessary to compel a transfer on the books of the corporation.[58] But where there is ancillary administration in the state of the domicile of a corporation, a foreign domiciliary representative of a deceased stockholder cannot, it has been held, transfer the stock, even though the certificates are in his possession.[59]

situated in another state or country,[61] although it has been held that he may assign a promissory note which is in his possession and that a mortgage given as security for the note will pass as an incidence thereto.[62] The representative may, however, without taking out letters where the land is situated execute a power of sale contained in a mortgage on such land,[63] since in such case his authority is not derived from the probate court of another state but from the contract of the parties.[64] For a similar reason[65] a foreign executor may, without taking out local letters of administration, make a sale of land under a power contained in the will.[66] It is necessary, however, that the will should be proved and recorded in the jurisdiction where the land is situated;[67] but such probate may be made after the date of the conveyance and will relate back and render it valid,[68] provided no rights of third persons have intervened.[69]

[§ 2693] E. Sales under Order of Court[70]—1. When Authorized. The courts of one state or country have no jurisdiction to order a sale of a decedent's realty situated in another,[71] and an order procured by a representative in the jurisdiction of his appointment confers upon him no authority to sell land outside of that jurisdiction.[72] Neither, in the absence of statute, can a representative appointed in one jurisdiction maintain in another a proceeding for the sale of land situated in that jurisdiction.[73] There are, however, in some states statutes providing that a foreign executor may be permitted by order of court to make a sale of land where no local representative has been appointed,[74] but statutes merely permitting a foreign representative to sue do not authorize such a proceeding.[75] An order may be made authorizing an ancillary representative to sell lands located in his own jurisdiction where there is an insufficiency of assets to pay debts;[76] and it has been held that to authorize such a sale it is not necessary to show that the personal estate at the domicile has been exhausted,[77] although there is also authority for the view that such a sale should not be ordered unless it appears that the creditors in the exercise of due diligence have been unable to obtain payment from the principal representative.[78] The court may also make an order for the sale by an ancillary representative of lands which decedent has by his will directed to be sold.[79]

[§ 2694] 2. Application and Proceedings. Where application is made for an order for the sale of land by an ancillary representative to pay debts, the petition must show that the situation exists which authorizes the proceeding,[80] namely, that claims have been regularly presented and allowed in the jurisdiction where the application is made,[81] and that the personal estate is insufficient to pay them.[82] Where the application is made for the sale of lands in the ancillary jurisdiction, to pay claims allowed in the domiciliary jurisdiction, the time within which the application must be made will be governed by the law of the domicile where the claims were allowed,[83] which in the absence of evidence to the contrary will be presumed to be the same as in the jurisdiction where the application is made.[84] Notice of the application must be given if required by statute, unless waived by the parties entitled thereto.[85] The statutes authorizing a foreign representative to apply for an order of sale[86] provide what the petition must show, and these requirements must be complied with.[87] A new bond need not be required of the foreign representative if the amount of the bond already given is sufficient to cover the proceeds of the sale.[88]

[§ 2696] 2. Effect of Allowance or Disallowance. The fact that a claim has been presented and allowed[96] or disallowed[97] in the jurisdiction of the domiciliary administration is no bar to its allowance in the ancillary jurisdiction; and conversely

[b] Prior presentation in domicile of decedent.—That a claim has been presented and allowed in the state in which decedent resided, or that claimant holds security therefor, is not ground for refusing to allow it in the state in which claimant lives, where the condition of the estate in the former state is not shown. State v. Rock County Prob. Ct., 67 Minn. 51, 69 NW 609.

[c] Failure to present in domicile of decedent.—A claim against a decedent's estate in the hands of the administrator with the will annexed in one state is not barred because it was not presented and has become barred against the estate of decedent in the hands of the domiciliary executors of the same will in another state. an allowance of a claim by a court of one jurisdiction is not conclusive upon a personal representative in another jurisdiction,[98] or even evidence in such jurisdiction of the debt on which the claim was based.[99]

[§ 2697] G. Payment of Claims[1]—1. In General. It is the duty of an ancillary representative after collecting the assets within the jurisdiction of his appointment to apply the same to the payment of the claims of local creditors,[2] and in some states also to the payment of claims of nonresident creditors who prove their claims in the ancillary jurisdiction, regard being had to the solvency or insolvency of the estate as a whole,[3] although there is also some authority for the view that an ancillary representative may pay only resident creditors.[4] In the payment of claims he is governed exclusively by the law of the jurisdiction in which he was appointed,[5] without regard to the domicile of decedent or of his creditors,[6] or the lex loci contractus.[7]

[§ 2698] 2. Local Creditors. While the chief object of an ancillary administration is the protection of local creditors,[8] and no transmission of assets will be made until they have received at least their pro rata share,[9] it cannot be made the means of giving such creditors any superior rights in case the estate as a whole is insolvent,[10] it being the general policy of the law that in such cases all the property applicable to the payment of the debts should be distributed among creditors pro rata according to the classification of their claims without regard to where the assets may be found or the creditors reside.[11] It follows that if the estate as a whole is solvent, the ancillary representative may proceed to pay the claims of local creditors in full,[12] but if it is not, local creditors are entitled to receive only such an amount as represents their pro rata share of the whole estate,[13] although they are entitled to receive that amount from the ancillary representative who need not transmit the assets in his hands to the domiciliary representative but may retain them until the amount to which each claimant is entitled is ascertained.[14]

equally with other creditors of the same class at the domicile until after they have received the same proportionate amount as he has recovered in the ancillary jurisdiction;[15] but if he has received a full payment in the ancillary jurisdiction, he cannot be compelled to refund any part thereof for distribution among other creditors of the domicile where the principal estate is insolvent.[16] The law of the ancillary jurisdiction governs all questions as to the payment of claims in that jurisdiction,[17] and in the case of claims of nonresidents it will not recognize and enforce priorities provided for by the laws of other states to the prejudice of its own citizens.[18] Of course a creditor cannot obtain payment of his claim in both jurisdictions, or, by presenting it in both, obtain more than his pro rata share in case the assets are not sufficient to pay all in full;[19] and if there is any property in the state or country where the creditor resides, which is applicable only to the claims of local creditors, he should exhaust his remedies there before seeking satisfaction in another jurisdiction.[20]

[§ 2700] H. Transmission of Residue to Domicile. As a general rule assets remaining in the hands of an ancillary representative after paying the claims of local creditors [21] will be transferred to the jurisdiction of the domicile of the decedent for distribution.[22] This rule, however, is not absolute or inflexible, but the transfer will or will not be made as the court may deem proper in the exercise of a sound judicial discretion according to the circumstances of the particular case.[23] In the absence of special circumstances making a local distribution proper the general rule of transmission to the domicile should prevail,[24] since the distribution, wherever made, must be according to the law of decedent's domicile,[25] and comity requires that it should be accorded to that jurisdiction;[26] but the court may, even in cases where a transmission of the residue is proper, refuse to order it until the domiciliary representative has given a sufficient bond to secure its proper administration.[27] While there is no question as to the authority of the court in the ancillary jurisdiction to order a residue of assets in that jurisdiction transmitted to the domiciliary representative,[28] the court of one jurisdiction has no authority over the representative of the other to compel him to bring in such assets whether it is the court of the domiciliary [29] or of the ancillary [30] jurisdiction.

And this distribution is to be made under the authority of the court within whose jurisdiction the deceased had his domicil, it not being competent for a court granting an auxiliary administration to order a distribution of the estate among the heirs and legatees." cause the right of succession to real estate is governed by the lex loci rei sitæ.[31]

[§ 2701] I. Distribution in Ancillary Jurisdiction. The court may in its discretion order that the residue of assets remaining in the hands of an ancillary representative after paying the claims of local creditors be retained and distributed by him instead of being transmitted to the principal representative,[32] and in a number of cases it has been held that under the circumstances of the particular case a retention of the assets was proper.[33] But since the distribution of, and succession to, personal property, wherever situated, is governed by the laws of the state or country where the owner had his domicile at the time of his death,[34] the distribution when made by the ancillary representative must be according to the law of the domicile.[35]

An error in distribution in the ancillary jurisdiction and those entitled to distribution apply for payment in the ancillary jurisdiction. Weaver's Est., 4 Pa. Dist. 260. (3) Where there are no special reasons for transmission and a local distribution would avoid expense and delay. Harvey v. Richards, 11 F. Cas. No. 6,184, 1 Mason 381; Fretwell v. [b] Local distributees should be protected as far as can be done without injustice to others interested, and assets may be retained in the ancillary jurisdiction for distribution to them until it appears whether any transmission to the domicile will be necessary. Yerkes' Est., 8 Pa. Dist. 36.

[c] Fund awarded by decree of court of domicile.—Where a fund in the hands of an ancillary administrator has been awarded by a decree rendered under the laws of decedent's domicile, such decree is conclusive in the ancillary jurisdiction, and the fund may be paid over there, without transmitting it to the place of domicile. Suarez v. New York, 2 Sandf. Ch. (N. Y.) 173.

naturally from the principle that letters of administration granted in one jurisdiction have no extra-territorial force,[39] and the rule is enforced even though there are no local creditors,[40] it is frequently stated that the rule is also based upon the principle that to allow a foreign representative to sue might be the means of exhausting or diverting local assets to the injury or inconvenience of local creditors.[41] Under this rule a foreign representative cannot maintain a special proceeding,[42] dismiss an appeal taken by decedent and pending at the time of his death,[43] or sue jointly with a local representative;[44] nor do statutes, providing that if a party dies pending an action the cause of which will survive, his personal representative may take upon himself the prosecution of the action, apply to a foreign representative in jurisdictions where a foreign representative is not authorized by statute to sue.[45]

By taking out ancillary letters a foreign representative becomes a domestic representative and entitled to sue.[46] In equity it is a settled rule that, where a foreign executor or administrator brings a suit without first obtaining ancillary letters in the jurisdiction in which he sues, a grant of letters subsequently obtained is sufficient to sustain the suit, if no objection on account of his incapacity had been taken; and if such objection had been taken, he could aver the subsequent grant of letters by an amended bill, and proceed with the suit the same as if he had been duly qualified at the commencement.[47] A similar rule has been applied in actions at law,[48] although there is also authority for the view that an action at law commenced by a foreign executor or administrator before obtaining ancillary letters cannot be sustained by a subsequent grant.[49]

Local Administration. A foreign representative may sue to collect a claim where, under the law of the state where the action must be brought, the claim could not be made the subject of local administration,[50] since in such cases the reasons for the rule prohibiting suits by foreign representatives do not apply.[51]

[§ 2704] c. Actions in Personal Capacity Generally. The rule that a representative cannot sue outside of the jurisdiction of his appointment applies only to actions which he must bring in his representative capacity and not where he sues as an individual.[52] If the cause of action is one which did not accrue to decedent in his lifetime but to the representative after the former's death, the representative may sue thereon in his own name,[53] and the fact that in such an action he styles himself as representative will not defeat the action but the designation may be disregarded as surplusage.[54] A foreign representative may sue in his own name on a contract made by himself with defendant,[55] to recover on an obligation executed or indorsed to him for money owing to the estate,[56] to foreclose a mortgage given to him as representative,[57] to recover damages for the infringement of a patent issued to him for an invention of decedent,[58] to recover from the principal obligor the amount of a debt for which decedent was surety and which the representative has paid,[59] to recover property of the estate to which he is personally entitled as a legatee[60] or title to which he has acquired by purchase from other legatees,[61] or to recover lands the title to which is vested in him by the will,[62] as in case of a devise to him in trust.[63] He may also sue to recover assets of the estate, title to which has vested in him as representative, but which have been removed from the state in which he was appointed,[64] or assets which an ancillary administrator has been ordered by the court to pay over to him.[65]

[§ 2705] d. Actions on Judgments. Where a representative has recovered a judgment in an action brought by him in his representative capacity in the jurisdiction of his appointment, he may sue thereon in his own name in another jurisdiction.[66] The reason for this rule is that such an action is brought by the representative in his personal capacity,[67] and indeed he is the only one could bring such an action, for an ancillary administrator, not being a party or privy to the judgment could not of course sue upon it.[68] It follows that the appointment of an ancillary representative does not preclude an action on the judgment by the foreign representative.[69]

A judgment in favor of decedent stands on a different basis, and the personal representative cannot sue thereon without taking out letters in the state where the action is to be brought.[70]

A foreign administrator de bonis non cannot sue on a judgment rendered in favor of his predecessor in the administration.[71]

[§ 2706] e. Actions on Bills and Notes. A foreign representative may sue in his own name on a negotiable bill or note belonging to his decedent's estate if it is payable to the bearer,[72] or if it is payable to the order of decedent and indorsed by him in blank,[73] or where the note matures after the death of decedent;[74] and the judgment recovered will be a bar to any subsequent proceeding against defendant on the note.[75] The action, however, is subject to any defense originally open to the promisor,[76] and as the note is the property of the estate, any proper claim which defendant has against the estate may be presented as a set-off in the action in the same manner as through the action were brought by plaintiff as representative.[77]

If the note is not negotiable or is made payable to the order of the payee and not indorsed an action thereon can be brought by the representative only in his representative capacity, and after taking out ancillary letters.[78]

A negotiable instrument payable to the representative in his official capacity may be the basis of an action by the representative anywhere;[79] and the same principle applies where an instrument is assigned to the representative in his capacity as such.[80]

Under a statute authorizing assignees to sue in their own names, an executor or administrator may assign a note to himself individually, and then sue on it in his individual name in any jurisdiction.[81]

Sending out of state for collection. Even if the executor or administrator cannot sue in a foreign jurisdiction on a note held by decedent, yet where he has acquired possession of it he becomes entitled to its control and proceeds, and he does not lose his right by sending it for collection to the state of the maker's residence, although ancillary administration has been granted there, and he may sue in such state to recover the proceeds of the note.[82]

[§ 2707] f. Actions for Death. The right of a foreign executor or administrator to sue for the death of his decedent depends on the terms of the statute giving a right of recovery and on whether or not such recovery constitutes assets of the estate.[83]

der these statutes a foreign representative may sue out an execution on a judgment rendered in favor of decedent in his lifetime,[85] or may prosecute an action commenced by decedent where the cause of action survives and no local representative has been appointed;[86] but such statutes do not confer upon foreign representatives any greater power in reference to property of the estate than is conferred by their letters of administration,[87] and do not authorize them to maintain any suit which they would not be authorized to bring in the court of the state where they were appointed.[88] Where under the statutes the right to sue is not general, it can be exercised only under the conditions[89] and with regard to the particular causes of action specified;[90] but a general right of action applies to actions for torts as well as those arising out of contract.[91] Statutes authorizing foreign representatives to sue do not oust the jurisdiction of probate courts to appoint ancillary representatives,[92] who when appointed have the superior right to sue in the jurisdiction of their appointment;[93] and such an appointment made after an action is instituted by a foreign representative may present a good defense to a further maintenance of the action,[94] although this is not invariably true,[95] and a substitution of the local ancillary representative is sometimes provided for.[96] In some states the statutes expressly restrict the right of a foreign representative to sue to cases where no local representative has been appointed.[97] Where there is no local representative, the right of a foreign domiciliary representative to sue is superior to that of a foreign ancillary representative.[98]

If the foreign representative dies pending an action instituted by him, the action abates, and an administrator de bonis non cannot be substituted as a party.[99] But the administrator de bonis non may bring a new action.[1]

[§ 2709] (2) Conditions of Exercise of Right—(a) Filing Letters Testamentary or of Administration. Some of the statutes authorizing foreign representatives to sue make no distinction between such representatives and those appointed under their own laws;[2] but under others the foreign representative is required to file his original letters testamentary or of administration or an authenticated copy thereof in some court of the state where the action is brought.[3] This requirement, however, is merely to furnish evidence of plaintiff's representative character,[4] and may be complied with after the suit is instituted,[5] unless the statute expressly provides that such letters shall be filed before commencing the action.[6]

[§ 2710] (b) Bond. Under some of the statutes a foreign executor or administrator bringing an action in a state court is required to give a bond,[7] in some cases a bond for costs being required,[8] and in others the requirement being that before judgment can be rendered the executor or administrator must give a bond for the proper administration of the amount recovered.[9] The requirement of a bond may

[a] Propriety of requirement.—"It is but an act of comity for the state to open its courts, so as to allow one clothed with power from a foreign authority to enter to assert the rights of his testator or intestate; having done so, it is not an unreasonable rule that she should require such foreign representative to produce properly authenticated evidence of the character in which he appears, for the safety and protection of its own citizens." Buck v. Johnson, 67 Ga. 82, 84.

[b] Mode of authentication.—If the statute is silent as to the mode of proof, the letters of a foreign executor or administrator must be authenticated in accordance with the federal statutes providing for the proof in one state of the records of the courts of other states. Hope v. Hurt, 59 Miss. 174.

[c] Place of filing.—The letters may be filed, under the statute, "in any county court in this state," and they need not be filed in the county in which the action is brought or in which the decedent left property. Murray v. Norwood, 77 Wis. 405, 408, 46 NW 499.

[d] Unauthenticated copy without effect.—Campbell v. Hughes, 155 Ala. 591, 47 S 45.

Proc. § 1836a, is ground for staying the suit, but not for dismissal. Lecouturier v. Ickelheimer, 205 Fed. 682.

be waived,[10] and is waived by a failure to raise any objection based on the failure to furnish the bond.[11]

[§ 2711] 2. Waiver of Objection as to Incapacity. One who is sued by a foreign executor or administrator may waive the objection that plaintiff has not capacity to sue[12] or has not complied with conditions on which his statutory right to sue depends.[13] It is usually considered that the objection is waived by failure to take it at the proper time and in the proper manner,[14] although it has been said that even if defendant has failed to raise the objection in any form by his pleading, it is still available to him on motion in arrest of judgment, or on error, if the record discloses the defect.[15]

[§ 2712] 3. Limitations.[16] Where a foreign representative is authorized by statute to sue without taking out ancillary letters of administration, the statute of limitations begins to run against the right of action from the date of his foreign appointment,[17] but where ancillary letters must be taken out, the statute does not begin to run until the date of the ancillary appointment.[18] A foreign administrator should not be allowed to sue where the statute of limitations has run against a local administrator.[19]

[§ 2713] 4. Defenses. In an action by a foreign representative on a cause of action accruing to decedent in his lifetime defendant is entitled to the same rights of defense as if the action had been instituted under local letters of administration.[20]

Where a foreign representative sues in his personal capacity,[30] and the facts alleged show that the action is sustainable in such capacity,[31] an averment of his official character may be rejected as surplusage.[32]

[§ 2716] b. Plea or Answer. Where foreign representatives are not authorized to sue, the fact that plaintiff is a foreign representative should ordinarily be pleaded in abatement,[33] and if not so pleaded will be waived;[34] but if the fact appears upon the face of the complaint the objection may be taken by demurrer,[35] and will be waived if not so taken.[36] Accordingly, a motion to dismiss a suit because plaintiff was appointed administrator in another state is too late after a plea on the merits.[37] In equity it has been held that, where the bill sets forth affirmatively, as the foundation of the right to sue, a foreign grant of letters, the objection may be raised at the hearing on the merits, under an answer denying all the allegations of the bill, but not specifically referring to plaintiff's incapacity to sue.[38] Where a foreign representative is authorized to sue, his right to do so can be questioned only by a plea under oath denying his representative capacity;[39] but defendant may by demanding oyer of the letters and demurring to the declaration to take advantage of any material variance between the letters produced and the statement of them in the declaration.[40] Where a foreign representative may or may not sue according to the circumstances of the case, a plea that he is a foreign representative is deficient unless it also shows that the facts were such that he was not authorized to sue.[41] If plaintiff's representative capacity is not questioned and the only objection is that he has not complied with some statutory requirement this fact should be pleaded in abatement,[42] unless specially pleaded, the objection is waived.[43]

[§ 2717] 7. Proof of Representative Capacity. The representative must prove his representative capacity at the trial if it has been put in issue by defendant,[44] but otherwise such proof is not necessary.[45] After the filing of an exemplification of letters of administration of a foreign administrator, such exemplification is admissible in evidence,[46] although not accompanied by an exemplification of the proceedings appointing plaintiff administrator.[47] It is sometimes provided by statute that a duly authenticated copy of the foreign letters is sufficient proof.[48] In the absence of statute the fact is sufficiently established by the production of plaintiff's foreign letters,[49] or of a certified copy of the record of the probate court and a certificate of the probate judge to the effect that such letters were issued.[50] Where a court of a sister state had power, on discharge of a public administrator, to substitute another as administrator, an order of substitution is conclusive in suit by the substituted administrator.[51]

[§ 2718] 8. Judgment. A statute providing that no judgment in favor of a foreign executor or administrator shall be rendered until the foreign representative shall first have given ten days published notice of the pendency of the action is for the benefit of those who hold adversary interests, more particularly local creditors, and can be invoked only by those whose rights might be affected by the omission.[52] A failure to give such notice is not a jurisdictional defect but a mere irregularity, and cannot be made a ground of attack on the judgment by a defendant who was duly served with process and contested the action on the merits.[53]

death be revived against a foreign representative of his estate.[57]

Personal service of process on a foreign executor or administrator within the state where an action is brought does not confer upon the courts of such state jurisdiction to entertain the action.[58]

Consent to be sued. It has been held that a foreign executor or administrator may waive his exemption from liability to suit,[59] but there is also authority for the view that a foreign representative cannot even voluntarily submit a suit against him in his representative capacity,[60] and if he does so a judgment rendered against him will not bind the estate,[61] or estop him from disputing the claim on which the action is brought when sued thereon in his own jurisdiction.[62]

"The remedy against a foreign administrator, in his representative character, to charge the assets of his intestate for a debt or liability of the decedent, is governed by the law of the jurisdiction where he was appointed, and must be pursued in the legal tribunals of the state or county where the decedent resided at the time of his death, and where administration was granted." Lyon v. Park, 111 N. Y. 350, 18 NE 863.

"Neither the common law, the law of nations, nor the statutes of this state permit a suit to be maintained in our courts against an executor or administrator who has obtained his letters testamentary or of administration from the courts of another state." Sloan v. Sloan, 21 Fla. 589.

[§ 2721] (2) Exceptions to Rule. Exceptions to the rule that a foreign representative cannot be sued have been made in a number of cases, but these exceptions are not universally recognized.[63] Practically all the cases have been suits in equity where peculiar circumstances were involved,[64] and which were permitted upon the ground of their necessity to prevent a failure of justice.[65] The proper rule has been said to be that an action at law should never be allowed to recover a mere money demand,[66] and that suits in equity should be allowed only when necessary to prevent a complete failure of justice.[67] Such suits have been allowed where a foreign representative came into another jurisdiction and took possession of assets belonging to that jurisdiction,[68] or brought with him assets from another jurisdiction,[69] or where he left the jurisdiction of his appointment and became a resident of another jurisdiction.[70] Where a representative appointed in one jurisdiction moves into another, taking with him assets of the foreign appointment, a bill in equity will lie in the latter jurisdiction to compel him to account for such assets to the persons lawfully entitled thereto,[71] where but for the interference of a court of equity there would manifestly be a failure of justice.[72] In such cases, however, he is not held to account as executor or administrator but as a trustee for those entitled to the effects in his hands,[73] and, to authorize such a proceeding, it must appear that he has assets within the jurisdiction of the court,[74] and that he is accountable to the complaining party as a trustee under a will or as a trustee ex maleficio.[75] In cases where a suit against a foreign representative is allowed the nature and extent of his liability will be governed by the laws of the jurisdiction of his appointment,[76] at least to the extent of the assets belonging to that jurisdiction.[77]

[§ 2722] (3) Statutory Liability. In a few jurisdictions actions against foreign representatives have been expressly authorized by statute.[78]

Statutes allowing foreign representatives to sue do not authorize them to be sued,[79] but do authorize them to appear and assert any affirmative right in favor of the estate, although in so doing they must in form appear as defendants.[80]

[§ 2723] b. In Other Capacities. The rule prohibiting suits against a foreign representative applies only where he is proceeded against in his representative capacity,[81] and he may be sued on any contract which he has himself made.[82] He may also be sued as a trustee,[83] or where he has rendered himself liable as an executor de son tort.[84]

[§ 2724] 2. Parties. In cases where a suit against a foreign representative can be maintained, if such a suit is brought by a legatee or distributee to recover property of the estate to which he is entitled, all the distributees or legatees who are interested therein should be made parties,[85] and any person claiming an interest in the property in question is a proper party.[86] In a suit against a foreign executor it is not necessary to make those who were named as coexecutors but who never proved the will parties.[87]

[§ 2725] 3. Process. Where a foreign representative is liable to be sued in the courts of the state, personal service of a summons made upon him while sojourning in the state is good.[88]

[§ 2726] 4. Appearance. Under a statute declaring that in an action against two or more executors, representing the same decedent, all are to be considered as one person, and those who are first served with process or first appear must answer, a general appearance by one of two foreign executors, sued jointly, is sufficient to bind both of them.[89]

[a] Such statutes are constitutional.—Craig v. Toledo, etc., R. Co., 3 OhS&CP 146, 2 OhNP 64.

[b] In Georgia it is held that under the constitutional provision giving to the superior courts of the state jurisdiction of all civil cases, and extending such jurisdiction to all persons who reside in the limits of the state, whether citizens, denizens, or temporary sojourners, a foreign executor or administrator may be sued there by creditors, or brought to an account by legatees or distributees. The provisions of the law, it is said, are general, and include executors and administrators as well as all other persons. If they come within the jurisdiction or limits of the state they may be sued in any county of the state in which they happen to be at the time when sued. The policy of the state is to furnish her own people a remedy to cover their rights in her own courts, without compelling them to go into a foreign jurisdiction to obtain their lawful and just claims. Johnson v. Jackson, 56 Ga. 326, 21 AmR 285.

[c] In Minnesota it is held that the statute which provides that "all actions which are pending against a deceased person at the time of his death may, if the cause of action survives, be prosecuted to final judgment, and the executor or administrator may be admitted to defend the same," authorizes the substitution of a foreign administrator as defendant, if a domestic administrator has not been appointed. The word "administrator" in the statute is said to be general and to apply to foreign as well as domestic administrators. Brown v. Brown, 35 Minn. 191, 192, 28 NW 238. But see Kropff v. Poth, 19 Fed. 200 (where the opposite conclusion was reached under a provision of the Revised Statutes of the United States, similar to the Minnesota statute).

"It would be a very narrow construction of the statute we now have, to hold that, under its provisions, a foreign executor can appear in the courts of this State only in those proceedings where he is in form the plaintiff, or the one who originates and sets such proceedings on foot. Numberless cases arise, both at law and in equity, where a party who is in form a defendant, is called upon to defend, protect and even prosecute affirmative rights and claims which are the subjects of the litigation. We see no reason for holding that a foreign executor may not, under the statute, appear in court in any form in which it may become necessary for him to appear in order to properly prosecute or enforce any of the claims of the estate of his testator. If so, he may often appear as a defendant. Take the ordinary case of the foreclosure of a mortgage by a foreign executor. There he may file his bill and obtain his decree for a foreclosure and a sale of the mortgaged premises, and if upon the entry of the decree the mortgagor should sue out a writ of error to have the cause removed to an appellate court, would any lawyer say that the complainant below would not be a proper defendant to the writ? Nor would the case be different where the testator dies after the decree and before the issuance of the writ of error. It is true the present proceeding is a bill to redeem rather than a bill for a foreclosure, but the presence of the mortgagee or her legal representative is just as essential to the collection of the mortgage, as it would have been if the bill had been for a foreclosure. The executors are here for the purpose of enforcing a claim of the estate of their testator, and we think they may fairly be held to be parties within the provisions of section 42 of the statute." tainty where it alleges the defendants' citizenship and residence in another state; that they are executors of the testatrix, named under an order of the proper court of a named county, in that state; that neither of them was ever appointed executor by any court of the state in which the action is brought; that they are suable only in the state of their appointment; and that their accounts as executors are still open and unsettled.[90]

The place for final accounting and settlement of executors is in the forum of original administration, and not that of ancillary administration.[98]

In equity a foreign executor or administrator, who comes within the jurisdiction of the court, may be compelled to account for assets within the state where otherwise there would manifestly be a failure of justice or a lack of any effective remedy.[99] Under such circumstances it is said that the representative is held to account, not in the character of executor or administrator, but as a trustee for those who are entitled to the assets in his hands.[1]

[§ 2729] 2. By Ancillary Representative. It is the duty of an ancillary representative to render an account of his ancillary administration to the proper court of the jurisdiction in which he was appointed,[2] and it is no excuse for his failure to do so that he sent the assets collected by him to the representative of the domicile and that they were there accounted for.[3]

Issues in proceeding for accounting. The question arising out of a contention that decedent had his domicile in the state cannot be litigated in a proceeding for an accounting by an ancillary administrator.[4]

Authority of court. At the accounting of an ancillary representative the probate court is vested with authority to consider only the subject matter of the property taken by him under the ancillary letters, and to make a decree disposing of such property, and none other.[5]

Allowances to ancillary representative. Where an ancillary administrator expends money for court costs and attorney's fees in good faith in an honest effort to preserve a part of the assets, he may recover for such expenses if for any sufficient reason the claim is settled by a reasonable compromise,[6] although the action and the compromise were not previously authorized by the county court.[7]

When commission refused. Where an ancillary executor unnecessarily, and without authority from the court by which he was appointed, takes the estate to another state for distribution, and there asks and obtains a maximum commission for a minimum of labor, and the estate is closed in the ancillary jurisdiction without any claim on his part for commissions, he is not, on a bill for an accounting in the ancillary jurisdiction, entitled to commissions.[8]

If there are no creditors in the ancillary jurisdiction the assets may be paid over to the representative of the domicile, and if there accounted for the ancillary representative will not be required to account.[9]

[§ 2730] 3. Where Same Person Is Ancillary and Domiciliary Representative—a. How Accounts Rendered. Where the same person is both principal and ancillary representative, he must account for his ancillary administration in the jurisdiction of the ancillary appointment,[10] and must also render a general accounting at the domicile.[11] A settlement in one jurisdiction does not relieve the representative of the obligation to account in the other.[12] The assets belonging to each jurisdiction are to be separately accounted for,[13] and the representative cannot be compelled to account in the ancillary jurisdiction for assets of the domicile,[14] or at the domicile for assets of the ancillary jurisdiction,[15] except such as remain in his hands after payment of all creditors in the ancillary jurisdiction.[16] If assets found in the ancillary jurisdiction are brought by the representative within the domiciliary jurisdiction he must account for them in the latter jurisdiction.[17] If in one settlement the representative through mistake charges himself with assets which he did not in fact receive he may be allowed credit therefor on his other settlement.[18] A credit taken in the accounting at the domicile must be excluded from the account of the ancillary administration.[19]

[§ 2731] b. Conclusiveness of Different Accountings. Where accountings are had in different jurisdictions, the judgment on the accounting in one jurisdiction is conclusive upon the courts of the other as to all matters adjudicated which were within the jurisdiction of the court,[20] but in so far as one settlement includes assets belonging to the other jurisdiction the judgment is not conclusive,[21] and will not relieve the representative from accounting for such assets where they properly belong.[22]

the court to complete the settlement of the estate, the appointee in such case being termed an administrator "de bonis non,"[23] or in case he represents a testate estate "de bonis non with the will annexed," or "cum testamento annexo."[24] Every administrator after the first is an administrator de bonis non in fact, even though the record may not show it,[25] and consequently a grant of general administration, where a grant de bonis non would have been proper, is not void, but has only the effect of an excess of power.[26]

Where original administration wrongful. On the death of an administrator whose appointment as such was wrongfully obtained, the court should grant to the person entitled thereto letters of original administration and not of administration de bonis non.[27]

[§ 2733] 2. Nature of Office and Source of Title. An administrator de bonis non is an administrator appointed to finish the business already commenced,[28] but he derives his title from decedent and not from his predecessor in office.[29] He, and not the widow or the distributees of the estate, is the new personal representative of decedent.[30]

[§ 2734] 3. Elements Bearing on Necessity or Propriety of Appointment—a. Previous Grant of Letters. Succession to a vacancy in the office being essential to the validity of a grant of administration de bonis non, it is necessary that there should have been a previous grant of letters.[31]

"An administration de bonis non is proper to be granted when a vacancy occurs in the administration in chief. Code § 111. After an administration of the latter character, there cannot, strictly speaking, be another administration in chief, and it is not proper for the court to appoint an administrator generally. The appointment should in terms be restricted to the character of an administrator de bonis non. But, the appointment of a second administrator, without such restriction, does not, on that account, render the second appointment void in toto. The authority of an administrator de bonis non is that of an administrator in chief, lessened in consequence of the previous administration, and if letters apparently in chief are issued, when they should be de bonis non, and without qualifying or limiting the grant of administration, the grant, not being void, has only the effect of an excess of power." thority for the view that after an estate has been adjudged finally settled and the administrator discharged, letters of administration de bonis non cannot issue upon the same estate while the final settlement remains unrevoked and in force.[52]

Assets subsequently discovered. An appointment de bonis non is proper when assets of the estate are newly discovered after the former executor or administrator has been discharged,[53] even though the original representative was discharged in consequence of his inability to discover assets.[54]

The existence of claims against the estate is not necessary to warrant an appointment,[55] but the fact that allowed claims have not been paid in full, and there remains property unsold, is sufficient to give the court jurisdiction to appoint an administrator de bonis non,[56] although the first executor or administrator has made a final settlement,[57] and there is no personal estate unadministered.[58]

Protection of the rights of legatees or distributees may give occasion for the appointment,[59] and it is very generally held proper to appoint an admin-

Wis.—Barney v. Babcock, 115 Wis. 409, 91 NW 982.

[a] The approval of the final account of an administrator is not an adjudication that he has turned into the estate all the assets belonging to it, but, without setting a final settlement aside, an administrator de bonis non may be appointed to take charge of any assets omitted from the former administration. Michigan Trust Co. v. Probasco, 29 Ind. A. 109, 63 NE 255.

[b] Discharge without notice.—Where an executrix, who was residuary legatee, obtained her discharge without filing or publishing notice of the hearing of her application, and no notice thereof was given to a legatee whose legacy the executrix had failed to pay, such discharge was no bar to the legatee's right to the appointment of an administrator de bonis non. Cole v. Shaw, 134 Mich. 499, 96 NW 573.

[c] Where an executor was also trustee under the will, an order allowing and settling his final account except as to the trust, and as to that adjudging the amount of the trust fund in his hands, and releasing him from all liability as executor on his paying such sum to those entitled thereto, and concluding that as to such sum the bond remained in force until the further order of the court, did not discharge the executor and deprive the court of jurisdiction to appoint an administrator de bonis non. Barney v. Babcock, 115 Wis. 409, 91 NW 982.

[d] Closing of estate.—(1) In Texas, where the court discharged an administrator and closed the estate, it was held the court had no power, after expiration of the term, to appoint an administrator de bonis non. Wallace v. Turner, (Civ. A.) 89 SW 432 [aff 99 Tex. 543, 92 SW 31]. (2) But a final order discharging administrators absolutely was held insufficient to negative the power of the probate court to appoint an administrator de bonis non, where there was nothing to show that the estate had been finally closed. Waterman Lumber, etc., Co. v. Robins, (Tex. Civ. A.) 159 SW 360 [aff as to this point but rev on other grounds 206 SW 825].

A. 696, 39 NE 533; Barnett v. Vanmeter, 7 Ind. A. 45, 33 NE 666. (2) Prior to this statute letters of administration de bonis non could not be granted as long as the final settlement remained in force. Croxton v. Renner, 103 Ind. 223, 2 NE 601; Vestal v. Allen, 94 Ind. 268; Pate v. Moore, 79 Ind. 20. (3) Even before the passage of the statute, a grant de bonis non was not precluded by the entry of an order discharging the original administrator, but continuing the administration as to matters embraced in exceptions to the report. Green v. Brown, 8 Ind. A. 110, 33 NE 979. (4) Nor was such a grant precluded by the discharge of the administrator because he could find no assets, since, in that event, there could be no final settlement. Langsdale v. Woollen, 120 Ind. 78, 21 NE 541.

Stickel v. Crane, 189 Ill. 211, 59 NE 595. (2) An administrator de bonis non cannot be appointed to sell the estate in remainder in the homestead, there having been no assets "discovered." Derge v. Hill, 103 Mo. A. 281, 77 SW 105.

[b] Retroactive effect of statute.—The act of March 5, 1891 (Rev. St. [1894] § 2395), providing that on a showing that an administrator has been finally discharged, that no administration is pending, and that there are assets within the jurisdiction of the state which have not been but should be administered, a court of probate having jurisdiction may on the application of any unpaid creditor or legatee or of anyone entitled to share in the estate appoint an administrator de bonis non with the powers of an administrator, applies to estates administered upon and in which final reports had been made and approved before the passage of the act. [e] When appointment improper.—Where an estate was administered, with the exception of a claim of sixty-six dollars and sixty-six cents, and final settlement made in 1895, and more than enough property distributed among the heirs to pay the remaining claim, the probate court was not justified in appointing an administrator de bonis non in 1901. Cole v. Shaw, 134 Mich. 499, 96 NW 573.

[b] Where the final settlement of a deceased administrator was set aside by the court, the appointment of an administrator de bonis non was proper. Byerly v. Donlin, 72 Mo. 270.

[c] Appointment to execute power of sale for distribution.—An administrator de bonis non is properly appointed to carry out the terms of a will providing for a sale and distribution of real estate after the

istrator de bonis non, although nothing remains to be done except to distribute the estate;[60] but on the other hand it has been held that, where the only office of administration would be distribution, and there is but one distributee,[61] or a distribution can be effected without resort to administration,[62] the estate will not be subjected to the unnecessary costs and expenses of an administration de bonis non.[63] A right of action which survives for the benefit of the estate may suffice for the appointment of an administrator de bonis non,[64] and so also may a lawful claim with right of action against the predecessor.[65]

Appointment to conduct litigation. Where, after the death of a general administrator who has not fully administered, litigation arises respecting the validity of a will, the new appointees for such a litigation should be designated as de bonis non.[66] Administration de bonis non may also be granted for bringing a suit to recover assets which the predecessor refused to prosecute,[67] or where the predecessor had reported debts as desperate which prove collectable, or had turned over as belonging elsewhere personalty which proves recoverable for the estate.[68] So also a pending action in the name of the original administrator is unadministered assets authorizing an appointment.[69] But where an administrator fully administered and filed a final account, and, after the approval of such account, misappropriated money and absconded, the distributees were entitled to sue on his bond, and the appointment of an administrator de bonis non was not necessary.[70]

[§ 2737] 4. Right to Appointment. The general rule is that persons are entitled to administration de bonis non in the same order as they would have been entitled to an original grant in case of intestacy or to letters with the will annexed in case there is a will.[71] Accordingly, the right follows the interest in the estate,[72] and next of kin are entitled to appointment in case of intestacy,[73] while the residuary legatee is usually preferred in case there is a will,[74] although under some circumstances a grant may be made to a specified legatee without citing the residuary legatee.[75] In the case of administration granted to the surviving spouse, especially when granted for his or her own benefit, followed by the death of the latter, administration de bonis non ordinarily goes by the interest as between kindred of the wife and husband, and hence the representatives of the spouse who survived are as a rule preferred[76] unless others have really the beneficial interest.[77]

Creditors are entitled to consideration[78] especially where the estate is insolvent or in desperate condition.[79]

Discretion of court. As between persons having an equal right to appointment the choice lies in the discretion of the court.[80]

Possession of qualifications. The person appointed must of course be qualified to act.[81]

Renunciation. It has been held that a renunciation of the right to letters de bonis non cannot be retracted,[82] and that an executrix who has renounced has no preferential right to be appointed administratrix de bonis non with the will annexed after the death of the administratrix with the will annexed;[83] but it has also been held that the right to administration de bonis non is not lost by renouncing the right to original administration.[84]

[§ 2738] 5. Jurisdiction. The court which granted the original letters testamentary or of administration and holds supervision of the estate has alone the right to grant administration de bonis non.[85] The courts of probate in Nova Scotia have all the jurisdiction formerly exercised by the ecclesiastical courts in England, and this includes the right of granting administration de bonis non.[86]

[§ 2739] 6. Time for Application. As a general rule a broad period is usually allowed for granting administration de bonis non, according as the opportunity to realize something for the estate may present itself;[87] nor does even the statutory limit to original administration bar by inference the grant of letters de bonis non.[88] It has been held, however, that a statute limiting the time within which administration may be granted does apply to administrators de bonis non.[89] An application for the appointment of an administrator de bonis non may be defeated by laches,[90] and as a general rule an administrator de bonis non cannot be appointed on the ground that there are debts of decedent remaining unpaid, if payment may be presumed from lapse of time, or if the debts are barred by the statute of limitations,[91] unless the administrator has power to waive the bar.[92]

[§ 2740] 7. Proceedings for Appointment. As a general rule it may be laid down that the rules governing proceedings for the appointment of an administrator de bonis non are substantially the same as obtain in proceedings for the appointment of an ordinary administrator.[93] It has been held, however, that, where letters of administration are revoked as being informally or illegally granted, new letters may be granted to the same person, or, it seems, to any other, without a new application.[94] Ordinarily, before a grant to a person not primarily entitled thereto, there should be a summons or legal notice to persons having a prior right to the appointment,[95] although such an appointment without notice is sometimes valid by reason of statutory provisions.[96] The fact that an administrator de bonis non was appointed on the petition of the attorney of a party, and not on the petition of one authorized to make or file such a petition, does not render the appointment void or even so improvident as to require annulment thereof.[97] A trustee receiving property of an estate under a judgment of a competent court which is still in force and unappealed from is such an interested party as to be entitled to contest a grant of administration de bonis non.[98]

Application or petition. It has been held not essential to the validity of the appointment of such an administrator that the necessity therefor should appear on the face of the application for letters;[99] but on the other hand a failure of the petition to show such necessity has been regarded as fatal.[1] An objection based on mere informalities must be seasonably made in order to be available.[2] The allegations of a petition, which are denied by the answer, cannot be accepted as proof authorizing an appointment.[3]

Hearing and decree. The court should not try title to property or determine questions of estoppel or other collateral points in such a proceeding.[4] A necessary decision in connection with the previous grant of letters that decedent was a resident of the county is conclusive on an application for the appointment of an administrator de bonis non.[5] An appointment made prior to the day fixed in the order and notice of a hearing for the appointment is minated.—An application for an administration de bonis non was not barred by laches, where the dower estate of the widow had not yet terminated. McCranie v. Hutchinson, 139 Ga. 792, 77 SE 1064, 45 LRANS 1073.

[a] Notice of resignation of former incumbent.—The statute requiring notice to distributees or legatees of a surrender of his trust by an executor or administrator as a condition precedent to a valid settlement with the court of the administration account of the person resigning is not inconsistent with the right of the court to accept a resignation and appoint a successor at once, requiring the outgoing executor or administrator to give notice and make settlement, until which he remains liable on his bond, and hence the appointment of an administrator de bonis non with the will annexed, without notice to the legatees of the surrender of his trust by the executor, is not void. Sivley v. Summers, 57 Miss. 712.

[b] Right of creditor.—Under the code the largest creditor is not required to be notified or summoned before administration is granted to a stranger, although he is entitled to administration if he applies for it and the law fixes no time within which he must assert his claim, nor is the court required to wait any time for him to do so. Consequently this is a matter left to the discretion of the court, and while as a general rule it is proper for the orphans' court to give some reasonable time for creditors and other persons who are not required to be notified to assert their claim, there may be cases where the security of the estate and the rights of creditors require immediate action, and of this the orphans' court is the best judge. Hence the court has a right if it sees proper to appoint an administrator de bonis non on the same day that original letters of administration are revoked. McGuire v. Rogers, 71 Md. 587, 18 A 888.

void.[6] A decree appointing an administrator de bonis non is not invalid because it was signed by the judge of probate in his law office instead of in the probate office.[7]

Appeal. An administrator who has been removed is not aggrieved by the decree appointing his successor so as to be entitled to appeal therefrom;[8] but a purchaser of the reversionary interest in land of a deceased insolvent person, which has been assigned to his widow as dower, may appeal from a decree appointing an administrator de bonis non,[9] and the widow may appeal from the appointment of the person selected by her children rather than the person selected by her.[10]

[§ 2741] 8. Operation and Effect of Appointment. The appointment of an administrator de bonis non is presumed to be valid in the absence of a contrary showing,[11] and is conclusive of his authority until set aside or annulled by a direct proceeding for that purpose.[12] The validity of the appointment is not affected by informality in the proceedings,[13] and the appointment is not subject to collateral attack,[14] where the record does not, on its face, disclose want of jurisdiction,[15] or unless there was no vacancy at the time of the appointment, in which case the appointment is void.[16] If the appointment is void the appointee is not even administrator de facto.[17] The unwise exercise of a legal discretion vested in the court as to whether an administrator de bonis non should be appointed cannot vacate the appointment,[18] nor will the appointment of an administrator to succeed an executor removed for good cause be disturbed, where the appointment is satisfactory to one entitled to more than four fifths of the estate.[19]

[§ 2742] 9. Bond. An administrator de bonis non must give a bond[20] the same as any other administrator,[21] but the amount of such bond is to be determined according to the portion of the estate which remains unadministered.[22]

[a] The word "administer," when applied to the disposition of the assets of a decedent's estate, is equivalent to "alter," "change," or "convert." The change or alteration of the goods necessary to amount to an administration of them by one administrator, so that they would be beyond the reach and control of the succeeding administrator de bonis non, is not a change in specie but a change in the property of the goods. Adams v. Internal Impr. Fund, 37 Fla. 266, 20 S 266.

[b] Money.—Where the personal estate consists of money and mortgages which have been reduced to money, money not disbursed as directed by will or probate court is "unadministered assets," to which the succeeding administrator is entitled on death of the predecessor. Galloway v. Freeburg, 97 Kan. 765, 156 P 766.

[c] Money deposited in a bank to the credit of decedent as executor passed to the administrator de bonis non of the estate of which decedent was executor, and not to the executor's administrator. Clark v. Farmers' Nat. Bank, 124 Ky. 563, 99 SW 674, 30 KyL 738.

[d] A sale of property (1) is a conversion and the administrator de bonis non cannot at common law sue for the proceeds. Calder v. Pyfer, 4 F. Cas. No. 2,299, 2 Cranch C. C. 430; Gilbert v. Hardwick, 11 Ga. 599; Clarke v. Wells, 6 Gratt. (47 Va.) 475. (2) But in equity the proceeds of the sale may be treated as unadministered assets. Clarke v. Wells, 6 Gratt. (47 Va.) 475.

[e] Administration by executrix who is also residuary legatee.—Where an executrix, who is also residuary legatee, pays the legacies, practically all the debts, and converts a portion of the estate to her own use, the estate is so far administered by her as that an administrator de bonis non of the testator is entitled to receive from her executor only such of the estate as she had not collected or appropriated at her death. Baker v. Bowie, 74 Md. 467, 22 A 133.

[f] Where a widow who was administratrix conveyed (1) property to a trustee for herself and the next of kin, this was an act of administration preventing the administrator de bonis non from recovering the property. Quince v. Nixon, 51 N. C. 289. (2) But under similar circumstances if the widow and executrix dies before any expressed or implied acceptance of the legacy, the property is unadministered and goes to the administrator de bonis non. Floyd v. Breckenridge, 4 Bibb (Ky.) 14.

[g] Property lawfully distributed among the persons entitled is not unadministered assets. Griffin v. Warburton, 23 Wash. 231, 62 P 765.

[h] Property delivered to life tenant.—Where a personal chattel is bequeathed to one for life, with no limitation over, the reversion vests, as in other cases of intestacy, in the next of kin, and a distribution and delivery to the tenant for life is a complete act of administration and distribution to the next of kin, and hence an administrator de bonis non cannot recover such property as unadministered effects belonging to the estate of the testator. Andrews v. Brumfield, 32 Miss. 107. To same effect Bates v. Woolfolk, 5 Ga. 329.

[i] When an executor has turned over to the testamentary trustee the property mentioned in a will, and made final settlement, his office ceases, so that his resignation and the subsequent appointment of the trustee as administrator de bonis non gives the latter no authority, not otherwise possessed, to convey any part of the trust estate. Cox v. Shelby County Trust Co., 80 SW 789, 26 KyL 50.

[j] Assets must be distinguishable as such.—An administrator de bonis non cannot maintain an action against the estate of his predecessor for money wrongfully received by him prior to his appointment as administrator, in the absence of allegation and proof that such money is distinguishable as a part of the intestate's property. Hodge v. Hodge, 90 Me. 505, 38 A 535, 60 AmSR 285, 40 LRA 33.

[k] Property purchased with decedent's money.—Where stock was purchased with money belonging to a decedent, the fact that the stock was not in existence at the time of his death does not rob it of its character of an unadministered asset. Michigan Trust Co. v. Probasco, 29 Ind. A. 109, 63 NE 255.

[l] Improper credit.—If an executor, on settling an account of his testator, allows credit for a check, this is not such an administration of this part of the assets as will preclude an administrator de bonis non from maintaining an action to recover the amount of the check, which he proves to be a forgery. State Bank v. Haldeman, 1 Penr. & W. (Pa.) 161.

[m] An unauthorized transfer of a note belonging to the estate, by the representative, under such circumstances that it amounts to paying his own debt with the property of the estate, is not an administration, and the administrator de bonis non is entitled to the note and to recover thereon. Cowgill v. Linnville, 20 Mo. A. 138.

[n] Statute not changing common-law rule.—The act of April 9, 1897, amending the act of March 27, 1874 (Gen. St. p 1425), by authorizing every administrator de bonis non with the will annexed to demand of the executor of a deceased executor all the "unadministered" assets of the first testator, does not change the common-law rule that such administrator can only administer such personalty as remains in specie in the form in which it existed at the death of deceased. Roy v. Squier, 61 N. J. Eq. 182, 48 A 233.

[o] Assets held unadministered.—A will provided that the income of one fourth of testator's residuary estate should be paid to the children of testator's deceased son, and that if any of such children died without issue the share of the deceased child should go to the survivors. On the death of the son's children, the one fourth of the residue was to be distributed among the son's grandchildren, taking by representation, and receiving their shares as they attained their majority. One of the testator's granddaughters died, leaving a husband and a son, who died about a year later. An administrator of the son's estate was appointed, and nearly twenty-eight years later, and after the death of the administrator as well as the husband, a petition was filed asking for directions as to the distribution of a portion of the fund. It was held that on the final distribution of the remainder of the fund the court had the power to correct errors made by the trustees in distributing other portions of the fund, and in making such corrections it was not necessary to appoint an administrator de bonis non of the deceased great-grandchild; but the administrator de bonis non with the will annexed of the father was entitled to receive the share due to the great-grandchild's estate. Minot v. Purrington, 190 Mass. 336, 77 NE 630.

Notes and Bonds. The common-law rule is that an administrator de bonis non cannot take possession of, collect, or sue on a bond, note, or other evidence of indebtedness running to his predecessor as such.[28] In equity the administrator de bonis non was held entitled to the proceeds of such a note or bond, although not to the possession of the instrument itself.[29] In a number of states the common-law rule has been departed from, sometimes by reason of statutory provisions, and the present rule is that the administrator de bonis non may take possession of, collect, and sue on such obligations,[30] although notes for which the former representative has accounted in his settlement cannot be recovered by the administrator de bonis non.[31]

[§ 2746] b. Money and Balances Due from Predecessor. A specific sum of money set apart as cash for the estate, and identifiable, may be claimed by the administrator de bonis non,[32] but at common law money not so specifically set apart, such as a balance due from the former representative, the result of his administration, is not, in the absence of statute, unadministered assets, and the administrator de bonis non is not entitled to such funds.[33] In many jurisdictions, however, statutes exist whereby an administrator de bonis non is entitled to and

[b] Consent to payment to administrator de bonis non.—Where executors took a note to themselves as such for the effects, and were then removed by the probate court, and an administrator de bonis non appointed who took a new note to himself for the amount, which was paid, the presentment by the survivor of the first executors of his account for allowance to the probate court, claiming the amount of the debt as a credit, was prima facie evidence of consent to the payment to the administrator de bonis non. [a] Moneys deposited.—(1) The administrator de bonis non is entitled to a fund on deposit which can be identified as the money of decedent. (2) But in the absence of proof as to what portion of a bank deposit in the name of a deceased executor belongs to his decedent's estate and what portion belongs to the estate of the executor, as charges for expenditures and commissions, the administrator de bonis non cannot draw out such deposit in gross, he being entitled only to the balance due his decedent's estate. Slaymaker v. Farmers' Nat. Bank, 103 Pa. 616. (3) An administrator de bonis non may not recover a deposit made by decedent if the first administrator has withdrawn a portion and surrendered the certificate. Brooks v. Mastin, 69 Mo. 58. (4) Where a bank account was, after the depositor's death, continued in his name by his administrator, who occasionally made deposits of money derived from the estate, it was held that if such balance was a part of the assets of the estate of the original decedent, and his deceased administrator did not distribute the same nor finally settle the estate, then it was an unadministered asset of the original decedent. But compare Miller v. Alexander, 10 S. C. Eq. 25 (administrator de bonis non entitled to balance due from his predecessor, as being only partially administered assets).

[a] Money collected by an agent or attorney of the former administrator is deemed at common law to be an administered asset, which the administrator de bonis non cannot recover from the agent or attorney. Wilson v. Arrick, 112 U. S. 83, may recover the balance due from his predecessor to the estate.[34] Under some statutes it is essential that the account of the former administrator be first settled before the administrator de bonis non can maintain a suit for the balance,[35] but a prior accounting is sometimes held not necessary.[36] An order of the probate court directing payment to the administrator de bonis non is sometimes a prerequisite to his right of recovery.[37] When a prior executor or administrator, after his discharge from office, collects money for the estate, it may be treated as money had and received to the use of the administrator de bonis non, who may sue the former representative in assumpsit.[38]

Debt from original representative to decedent. An administrator de bonis non may recover of the original representative a debt due from him to the decedent in his lifetime,[39] unless the debt as such has been extinguished by some act of the former representative by which his indebtedness was acknowledged, as returning it in the inventory.[40]

Where an administrator is dismissed and adjudged to pay interest and damages, these amounts are payable to his successor in office and not to the creditor who procured his dismissal.[41]

[§ 2747] c. Property Illegally or Fraudulently Sold or Transferred. A sale, transfer, or payment made without authority passes no title and does not constitute an administration.[42] Therefore an administrator de bonis non may pursue assets so disposed of.[43] Not only may this be done where the

[b] Where balance voluntarily paid.—If the balance due from the administrator in chief is voluntarily rendered by him to the probate court on his final settlement, it becomes assets of the estate when paid into the hands of his successor for which he and his sureties are liable. Whitworth v. Oliver, 39 Ala. 286; Brice v. Taylor, 51 Ark. 75, 9 SW 854.

[c] When it becomes necessary to remit to the probate court for administration a balance recovered in another tribunal from an executor or administrator in chief, it must be paid to the administrator de bonis non as assets of the estate. Brice v. Taylor, 51 Ark. 75, 9 SW 584.

[d] When fund ready for distribution.—If it can be ascertained from the records of the probate court that the fund is ripe for distribution, nothing is in the way of an order to that effect in the tribunal where it is recovered, and it is then unnecessary to encumber it with costs and delay by remitting it to the probate court. Brice v. Taylor, 51 Ark. 75, 9 SW 854; Gray v. Harris, 43 Miss. 421.

sale or transfer is contrary to law,[44] but also where it is fraudulent, in which case the administrator de bonis non may avoid it,[45] unless the persons interested in the estate have ratified it.[46] It has been held that the administrator de bonis non may ratify an improper sale by his predecessor and elect to take the proceeds,[47] but there is also authority for the view that the right to ratify an illegal sale of land belongs solely to the heirs,[48] and therefore the administrator de bonis non cannot ratify such a sale nor sue his predecessor for the proceeds.[49] It has been held that the statute of limitations does not begin to run against an action by an administrator de bonis non to recover property wrongfully sold by his predecessor until the appointment of the administrator de bonis non,[50] but it has also been asserted that the possession of the purchaser is adverse to the original administrator, and the statute runs from the time of delivery of possession.[51] The declarations of the former administrator as to the validity of the sale are not admissible to support the action.[52]

[§ 2748] d. Liability of Former Representative for Waste or Conversion. At the common law an administrator de bonis non has no right of action against his predecessor for a devastavit by him committed, such right belonging to creditors and distributees alone;[53] but in many jurisdictions statutes have conferred upon the administrator de bonis non powers sufficient to sustain an action by him

[b] Payment of an unfounded claim in good faith, the administrator and claimant both believing it to be valid, will not ground an action by the administrator de bonis non to recover it back. Mayhew v. Stone, 26 Can. S. C. 58.

[c] Payments by way of distribution (1) but not in fact made to the next of kin do not protect the former administrator from a suit by the administrator de bonis non for the sums so paid. Carter v. Trueman, 7 Pa. 315 [aff 3 PaLJR 101, 4 PaLJ 462]. (2) But payments to certain distributees of more than their share of the estate distributed by the former administrator will not ground an action by the administrator de bonis non if the shares can be equalized in future distributions. Patterson v. Bell, 25 Iowa 149. [c] In South Carolina (1) where the administrator has the right to dispose of property belonging to the estate, the fact that a disposition is made with fraudulent motives and in collusion with the purchaser will not entitle the administrator de bonis non to follow the property into the hands of the purchaser, such right being possessed by the legatees and creditors only. Knobeloch v. Germania Sav. Bank, 43 S. C. 233, 21 SE 13; Steele v. Atkinson, 14 S. C. 154, 37 AmR 728; Johnston v. Lewis, 14 S. C. Eq. 40, 33 AmD 74. (2) But where actual fraud is practiced on the administrator, whereby he is induced to dispose of property belonging to the estate, it seems that the administrator de bonis non may follow the property into the hands of the purchaser. land sold by his predecessor[58] or decedent,[59] and it has been held that he may maintain a suit to set aside an illegal sale made by his predecessor when necessary in order to subject the land to the payment of debts,[60] although this has been denied.[61] A mortgage taken by an administrator in his own name may after his death be enforced only by his own representative,[62] but one taken by an executor to himself as such and to his successors passes to the administrator de bonis non.[63] The appointment of an administrator de bonis non does not start anew the period during which land may be sold for the payment of debts, and the limitation in that respect continues to run as under the previous administration.[64]

[§ 2750] C. Powers and Duties[65]—1. In General. So far as concerns the assets to which an administrator de bonis non is entitled he represents the estate[66] and has all the powers and responsibilities of a general administrator.[67] That is to say that all the powers and duties of the preceding executor or administrator vest in the administrator de bonis non for the purpose of enabling him to complete the administration,[68] unless his powers are limited by statute.[69] The advice of the court may be sought and obtained by an administrator de bonis non in difficult and doubtful matters.[70]

[§ 2751] 2. Collection of Assets—a. In General. It is the duty of the administrator de bonis non to take possession of unadministered effects of decedent,[71] within a reasonable time,[72] and to this end he may maintain any action necessary or proper for the recovery of such assets.[73] So far as the statute confers on him the right to assets or demands against his predecessor,[74] he may maintain actions against his predecessor or his personal representative for their enforcement.[75] It is not, however, the duty of an administrator de bonis non to cause a re-examination of his predecessor's accounts.[76] In some states statutes provide for a summary order from the probate court requiring assets in the predecessor's hands to be delivered to the administrator de bonis non.[77] The right of the administrator de bonis non to the assets cannot be defeated by the sole distributee paying the debts of the estate, and taking possession of the property.[78]

[§ 2752] b. Judgments in Favor of Predecessor. At common law an administrator de bonis non could not enforce a judgment recovered by his predecessor during his administration,[79] but could maintain a new action on the debt.[80] Provision is, however, sometimes made by statute for enforcement by the administrator de bonis non of a judgment recovered by his predecessor.[81] Where the administrator de bonis non is entitled to enforce the judgment by execution, he is also entitled to supplementary and ancillary remedies.[82] The administrator de bonis non is a necessary party to a bill to enforce a decree to which his predecessor was a party.[83]

[§ 2753] 3. Distribution. After payment of debts and expenses of administration, it is the duty of the administrator de bonis non to distribute the estate to the persons entitled thereto.[84]

[§ 2754] D. Liabilities. The administrator de bonis non is not chargeable generally with all the undistributed assets of the estate, but only with such as came into his hands, or would have come into his hands had he used good faith and reasonable diligence.[85] The inventory and settlement in court of the former administrator do not bind, even presumptively, the administrator de bonis non as to Connecticut Trust, etc., Co. v. Security Co., 67 Conn. 438, 35 A 343 (holding further that the fact that the wife's administrator delayed for eighteen months after the husband's death before applying for his letters of administration did not constitute laches barring his recovery from the husband's administrator of the wife's personalty, the delay having resulted in no injury).

assets coming into his hands,[86] but a settlement between the administrator de bonis non and his predecessor is prima facie correct.[87] The administrator de bonis non is not responsible for the failure to realize moneys insecurely invested by his predecessor and thereby lost.[88] His liability is for his own acts,[89] and he cannot be called to account for the maladministration of his predecessor.[90] The measure of duty on the part of an administrator de bonis non is the exercise of good faith and ordinary care and diligence, and he is liable for failure to reach that standard but not beyond.[91] He cannot be charged with assets which he failed to realize because of excusable ignorance of their existence,[92] but he is required to exercise ordinary diligence both in discovering and in obtaining possession of assets, without special demand or request so to do,[93] and may be charged with the resulting loss to the estate if he fails to collect assets within a reasonable time.[94] Where the administrator de bonis non has no knowledge of the pendency of an action against his predecessor, and he is not made a party to such action within the statutory period after his appointment within which actions against an administrator must be brought, and no new assets come into his hands, the action cannot thereafter be revived against him.[95]

[§ 2755] E. Effect of Contracts and Transactions of Predecessor. At common law there was no privity between an administrator de bonis non and his predecessor,[96] as the administrator de bonis non took the unadministered assets as the representative of decedent and not as the representative of the former executor or administrator,[97] and his rights and duties concerned only assets not administered at all by the predecessor, and his administration was therefore practically independent of his predecessor's acts.[98] But the effect of the modern extensions of the rights of the administrator de bonis non is to bind him by all acts of his predecessor lawfully performed within the scope of his duties.[99] He is not, however, bound by acts of his

The administrator in chief, by the terms of the grant to him, was clothed with title to, and the duty and authority of administering, all the goods and chattels, rights and credits, which were of the testator or intestate at the time of his death. The administrator de bonis non, by the terms of the grant to him, was confined, limited in authority to the goods and chattels, rights and credits of the testator or intestate, which were unadministered—it was de bonis non administratis. The import of the terms of the respective grants clearly indicates the distinction between them, and, so far as regards the administrator de bonis non, directs attention as to what act of the administrator in chief, or what was done while his authority was of force, within the line of his duty, was an administration." "In many respects the acts of the administrator, within the sphere of his duty and power, are obligatory upon his successor, so far as to charge the estate. They bind the administrator de bonis non, because the estate came to his hands charged with them by acts of the administrator which he might legitimately do in the management of the estate predecessor which were fraudulent[1] or illegal.[2] It is usually held that an administrator de bonis non may enforce by action a contract of his predecessor which the latter might have sued on in his representative capacity,[3] although this has been denied.[4] While by the common law the administrator could bind only himself and not the estate by obligations created by him,[5] now such obligations created on behalf of the estate can usually be enforced against an administrator de bonis non to the extent of the available assets in his hands.[6]

[§ 2756] F. Administrators De Bonis Non with the Will Annexed. In the case of an administrator de bonis non with the will annexed, any question arising out of his de bonis non character or based upon the fact that there has been a prior administration is governed by the same rules as though he was an ordinary administrator de bonis non,[7] while in his capacity as administrator with the will annexed he stands upon the same footing as any other administrator with the will annexed as to the powers which he may exercise and the duties which devolve upon him.[8]

XIX. ADMINISTRATORS WITH THE WILL ANNEXED

[§ 2757] A. Appointment—1. When Necessary or Proper. Where a decedent has left a will but such will does not nominate any executors, or none of the persons named as executors can or will act as such, the court appoints a person to perform the necessary duties connected with the settlement of the estate, and such appointee is termed an administrator "with the will annexed," or "cum testamento annexo."[9] Such an appointment is also proper where the person nominated as executor is while in his hands. If this were not so, the admission of the payment of a debt due the estate, or the execution of a receipt therefor, which is but another form of admitting payment by the administrator, would not bind the estate in the hands of his successor; and the administrator would be capable of doing no act, however legitimate, to the management of the estate, and in whatever good faith done, that could create a liability upon the estate, or continue one already existing. Under this rule, if the intestate, in his lifetime, had contracted to pay a sum of money by a stated time, upon a third person performing a certain act, and the intestate died before the time appointed, and the other party complied with his contract by the day, the admission by the administrator that the other party had complied, would not be sufficient to give him the benefit of the contract against the estate. Such a principle, if carried out, would produce the greatest inconvenience to estates, if it would not make the administration of them impracticable. We take it to be clear, that an administrator may make admissions which will bind the estate, provided he acts in good faith and with due regard to the best interests of the estate, and in a matter necessarily connected with its administration." [§ 2758] 2. Persons Entitled to Appointment—a. Statutory Regulation. The selection of an administrator with the will annexed, like that of an ordinary administrator, is largely regulated by statutes prescribing the order in which particular persons shall be entitled to preference.[22] Under some statutes the same order prevails as in case of intestacy,[23] but the more usual governing principle is that the person most beneficially interested under the will shall have the preference, and as a general rule to cover the cases not specially provided for the person having the right to the estate ought to have the right of administration,[24] and the grant will be generally made to the person having the largest interest.[25]

[§ 2759] b. Right of Particular Persons or Classes of Persons—(1) Legatees—(a) In General. As a general rule the right of administration with the will annexed belongs to legatees under the will,[26] and an erroneous description of a legatee will not defeat his right in this respect, if it appears that he was in fact the person intended.[27] So also one who is a legatee, although not named in the will, is entitled to apply for letters of administration with the will annexed.[28] Where the will directed that the share of a legatee should be paid to her in monthly installments, the balance remaining at her death to go to her children, one of such children was entitled to letters of administration, although his application was opposed by the legatee, where the legatee did not ask for the issuance of letters to her,[29] although it has been held that, where the statute gives the right of administration to "distributees," a legatee or devisee has no preferential right to be appointed administrator with the will annexed[30] or to designate another for such appointment.[31]

[§ 2760] (b) Residuary Legatee. As a general rule the residuary legatee is preferred in the appointment of an administrator with the will annexed,[32] and this is especially true where the residuary legatee is the widow.[33] Where the will is silent as to the appointment of an administrator with the will annexed, the appointment is left to the discretion of the court.[34]

[b] Where estate fully administered except for trust.—Where a will created a spendthrift trust and vested the legal title to the property in the executor as trustee, and the executor died after having fully administered the estate, in so far as his duties as executor were concerned, the county court had no jurisdiction to appoint an administrator with the will annexed, but the further administration of the trust should be accomplished through a trustee to be appointed by the district court. McClelland v. McClelland, 46 Tex. Civ. A. 26, 101 SW 1171.

[c] Where testator devised all his property to his wife, and she survived him and died, her duly appointed administrator was the proper party to caveat an application by the next of kin of her deceased husband for letters cum testamento, as there was no reversionary interest which the applicants would have had the right to administer. In re Engle, 124 Cal. 292, 56 P 1022.

[b] In the case of a testate nonresident, if the executor neglects or refuses to act in the state where property is located, the appointment of the administrator with the will annexed should be left wholly to the discretion of the judge of probate the same as the appointment of the administrator in the case of a nonresident intestate. In such case the statute providing that "when a person living out of a state shall die intestate, leaving property within the state, administration may be granted in any district where the estate or some part thereof shall be, to such person as the court shall see fit" governs, and not the statute providing that "upon the refusal of an executor to accept the trust or give a bond the court shall commit administration of the estate with the will annexed to the widow or next of kin of the deceased, and may cite them to appear before it, and upon their refusal, or neglect of appearance, or incapacity, may grant administration to one of the principal creditors, or on their refusal to such other person as the court shall think fit;" for the latter statute is a rule for the guidance of the probate court only in confiding administration upon the estates of deceased residents. [a] Policy of statute.—"Section 2643 of the Code, which provides for granting letters with the will annexed, is plainly based upon the principle that he who has the interest in the estate which most needs protection from waste, extravagance and incompetency shall be first entitled to control and manage such estate, and, therefore, the residuary legatee is given the prior right to administer. When experience showed that often an infant was a residuary legatee, such right was extended by the amendment of 1901 to his general guardian, thereby again indicating the intention of the Legislature to protect in such appointment, a vested interest. Next in order of priority is the principal or specified legatee, and also by the amendment of 1901 the general guardian of an infant principal or specified legatee, following the principle that he who has an interest to protect should be in a position to furnish it protection. It will also be noticed that it was not the greatest money interest that was recognized, for often the general legatees have a greater money value in their interests than have the residuary legatees in the careful management of the estate since usually expenses and losses fall solely upon the residuary estate, or if there be no such estate, then upon the estate given to the general legatees." pointment before all other persons.[32] Even though the estate is such that the residuary legatee is not likely to have a residue, or by the terms of the will he must hold that residue with limitations, the presumption of the testator's favor upholds his claim to be considered first,[33] and where a person is not only sole residuary legatee but sole beneficiary under the will, his claim for appointment where an executor is wanting becomes still stronger.[34]

A mere trustee of the residue has been held not entitled to appointment, for in that case the cestui que trust should be preferred as the real beneficiary,[35] but in other cases a residuary legatee in trust has been held entitled to appointment.[36]

Right of remainderman. Where the residuary estate was bequeathed in trust for the benefit of the testator's widow during her life or widowhood with remainder over, it was held that letters of administration with the will annexed should be granted to the remaindermen, and not to the widow.[37]

[§ 2761] (c) Principal or Specified Legatee. Subject to the prior right of the residuary legatee, the right of administration with the will annexed is sometimes given by statute to a principal or specified legatee.[38]

[§ 2762] (2) Surviving Spouse. Under some statutes the surviving husband or widow has the first right,[39] but as a general rule the right of the surviving spouse is subsequent to that of persons interested under the will.[40] It has been held that the widow of the testator was entitled to appointment, although a nonresident, as against one whose right to remuneration for his services as an "agent" had not yet become fixed, and whose status had not yet become that of a "creditor" of the deceased.[41]

[§ 2763] (3) Next of Kin. The next of kin of a testator, especially if they have a beneficial interest in the estate or if the will contains no clear disposition of the residue, have a right to administration with the will annexed, which right is usually subsequent to that of legatees or the surviving spouse but prior to that of any creditor or stranger.[42]

[§ 2765] (5) Strangers. In case no person belonging to any one of the classes before mentioned applies for or is willing to take administration with the will annexed the court may appoint some other suitable person.[45] Provision is sometimes made by statute for the appointment of a person or persons not entitled to share in the estate, upon the written consent of the persons who are entitled to share therein.[46]

[§ 2766] (6) Representative of Person Entitled. The right to administration with the will annexed has been held to pass to the assignee of the person entitled,[47] or in case of such person's death to his personal representative,[48] and where the person entitled is a minor, administration should, it has been held, be granted to his guardian,[49] or if such person is a lunatic, letters are properly granted to his committee.[50] Letters have also been granted to the attorney of the person entitled,[51] and it has also been regarded as proper to issue letters to the attorney of a foreign executor [52] or a married woman who was named as sole executrix but whose husband objected to her acting in that capacity.[53] In England it has been held that, when a corporation aggregate is named as executor, administration with the will annexed will be granted to its syndic.[54]

[b] Right to share in unbequeathed assets.—The provision of Code Civ. [b] Assignment transfers interest.—An assignment by a sole legatee, who was mother of testator, of a part of her interest as "heir at law" transfers an interest in the property conveyed by the will, and renders the assignee a person interested in the will entitled to petition for the issuance to himself of letters of administration. The husband of a person beneficially interested in the estate is not entitled as a matter of right to administration with the will annexed.[55]

[§ 2767] (7) Nominee of Person Entitled. In some jurisdictions the right of the person entitled to administration with the will annexed to nominate a person to act as such administrator in his stead has been sustained,[56] and it has also been held that a person having a prior right to be appointed administrator with the will annexed may have another person appointed with him as his coadministrator, even though such person is a stranger.[57]

[§ 2768] (8) Person Named in Will as Executor. Under some circumstances a person nominated as executor by the will may be unwilling or unable to act as such and yet may serve as administrator with the will annexed.[58]

[§ 2769] (9) Nominee of Executor. It has been held that an executor cannot nominate a person for appointment with the will annexed,[59] especially where such an appointment becomes necessary because the executor has been removed,[60] but it has also been considered that it is proper to appoint the nominee of an executor who has renounced.[61]

[§ 2770] (10) Effect of Opposing Probate or Contesting Construction of Will. The right to letters of administration with the will annexed is not lost by opposing probate of the will,[62] and, a fortiori, a legatee does not lose his right because he is the contestant in a proceeding involving the construction of the will and the ascertainment of the amount to which the several legatees are entitled.[63]

[§ 2771] (11) Preferences. The preferences which are recognized in the appointment of ordinary administrators[64] obtain where there are several persons equally entitled to administration with the will annexed,[65] although the will, or even the testator's expressed wish as between persons having equal rights, may also conclude the choice in case of doubt.[66]

The public administrator may, it has been held, be selected by the court in preference to persons interested in the estate, although the court is under no duty to appoint him.[67]

[§ 2772] c. Effect of Appointment of Wrong Person. The appointment as administrator with the will annexed of a person other than the one entitled to, and asking for, such appointment is not void for want of jurisdiction, but only erroneous.[68]

[c] Adverse interest.—Where a testator leaves a will without naming an executor and it appears that in his lifetime he had begun a suit against his daughter which suit was pending at his death, it is improper to appoint the daughter as administratrix with the will annexed. Job's Est., 23 Pa. Super. 611.

[d] Hostility, litigation, and assertion of adverse title.—Although the statute gave the widow a prior right, it was proper to refuse to appoint her, where she was very hostile to, and not upon speaking terms

tor, if decedent had died intestate, cannot be appointed administrator with the will annexed.[70]

[§ 2774] 4. Renunciation. The right to administration with the will annexed may of course be renounced;[71] but the right is not lost by recognizing the prior right of another.[72] It has been held that a renunciation cannot be withdrawn without the consent of the surrogate,[73] but the fact that a person who is entitled to administer generally renounced that right when it was supposed that decedent had died intestate does not deprive him of the right to administration with the will annexed, upon the subsequent discovery of a will and renunciation by the executor.[74]

[§ 2775] 5. Proceedings for Appointment.[75] A proceeding for the appointment of an administrator with the will annexed is entirely distinct from the proceeding of the admission of a will to probate.[76] With respect to the time within which such a proceeding should be brought it has been held that a statute limiting the time for the probate of wills governs, rather than a statute limiting the time for administration on intestate estates.[77] A written petition for probate of the will is not necessary to give the court jurisdiction to appoint an administrator with the will annexed,[78] but where a foreign will has been probated in another state, it must be produced before the surrogate in a county where the testator left real estate in order to warrant a grant of original letters of administration with the will annexed.[79]

Notice of the application for letters must be given to persons having a right prior to the applicant,[80] but persons having no prior right need not be cited,[81] and an appointment of one of several equally entitled without notice to the others has been held valid.[82] It has been held that the failure of an executor to qualify at the proper time does not justify the appointment of an administrator with the will annexed until after the executor has been cited to appear and show cause why he should not accept or decline the trust.[83]

A caveat to a petition for appointment as administrator with the will annexed of a person claiming to be next of kin and beneficially interested is insufficient and should be stricken out where it fails to allege that the petitioner is neither next of kin nor beneficially interested.[84]

The record should show cause for granting administration with the will annexed;[85] but where a court of probate receives proof of a will and admits it to record, and six months afterward grants administration with the will annexed, the failure to state in the record that the executor named in the will had renounced does not make the grant of administration absolutely void.[86] The omission of the words "with the will annexed" from an order appointing an administrator on the same day that a will was admitted to probate does not invalidate the order.[87]

Appeal. An appeal from an order appointing administrators with the will annexed is not an equitable action.[88] A person originally appointed executor by a will but whose name was afterward stricken out by direction of the testator has not a sufficient interest to warrant the issuing of a supersedeas at his request to reverse an order appointing an administrator with the will annexed in default of executors.[89]

[§ 2776] 6. Bond. An administrator with the will annexed is required to give a bond,[90] the same with, the principal devisee and legatee, was litigating with the curator of the estate, and was asserting title to property which testator attempted to dispose of by his will. Smith v. Lurty, 107 Va. 548, 59 SE 403.

[e] Where husband of legatee engaged in contest with estate.—The fact that a demand against the husband of a residuary legatee had been put in suit and resulted in a judgment in his favor from which the personal representatives had appealed is no objection to appointing the residuary legatee administratrix with the will annexed. Matter of Place, 4 NYSt 533.

[f] Person against whom suit by testator pending at time of death.—Where it appears that in his lifetime testator had begun a suit against his daughter, which suit was pending at his death, it is improper for the court to appoint the daughter as administrator cum testamento annexo. In such a case one of the other heirs, or, if all the other heirs have renounced, a person nominated by such heirs, should be appointed. Job's Est., 23 Pa. Super. 611.

[g] The fact that one is hostile to the terms of a will, and sets up an adverse claim, does not render him incompetent to act as administrator with will annexed, his bond as administrator affording protection to the persons interested. Rice v. Tilton, 13 Wyo. 420, 80 P 828.

as any other administrator.[91] Such a bond should be in the same form as the bond of a general administrator, with a provision for the payment of legacies added,[92] and where the special duties imposed on the executor by the will devolve on an administrator de bonis non with the will annexed, the bond of such an administrator must be commensurate with the powers and trusts contained in the will.[93] It has been held, however, that the bond of an adminstrator with the will annexed, in the ordinary form required of a general administrator, may be upheld,[94] although there is also authority for the view that such a bond is not sufficient.[95]

[b] Administration according to will.—Although an order of the county court appointing an administrator and showing his qualification did not contain the words "with the will annexed," where his bond contained those words and showed that it was given by him as administrator with the will annexed, such was the legal effect of his appointment, and, even if it had not been expressed in the bond where the will was in existence, and had been duly probated, the estate devised had to be administered according to the will, and not as in a case of intestacy. or sell property to pay debts by leave of court.[99] But he cannot exercise any powers which the executor named in the will could not have exercised.[1]

Property subject to administration with the will annexed. Administration with the will annexed, according to the weight of authority, extends to the entire personal estate of the testator, and is not limited to that portion which has been disposed of by the will,[2] although it has been held to be so limited.[3]

[§ 2778] 2. Exercise of Discretionary Powers Generally.[4] Where the will gives to the executor named therein discretionary powers and imposes on him duties involving personal trust and confidence, and which do not ordinarily come within the scope of administrative functions, such powers and duties do not pass to or devolve on an administrator with the will annexed,[5] although such administrator is by statute or a decree of court, expressly invested with all the rights and powers of and subjected to the same duties as an executor named in the will,[6] unless it clearly appears from the will that the testator intended to confer the powers and duties upon the executor merely virtute officii, and that they should be exercised in any event.[7]

An application for the appointment of a trustee to carry out the provisions of the will, which do not devolve upon an administrator with the will annexed, may be made by such administrator to a court of equity.[8]

[§ 2779] 3. Exercise of Testamentary Power of Sale. As a general rule a power of selling real estate conferred by will upon a named executor is one of personal trust and confidence which cannot be exercised by an administrator with the will annexed.[9] But it is otherwise where the will clearly

"It is a general and well settled rule, both of law and equity, that a power given by will to the executor to sell and convey land, is to be considered as a personal trust. In contemplation of law, the power is given in consequence of the confidence which the testator had in the judgment, discretion and integrity of the executor, and the execution of that power cannot, by the executor, be delegated to any other person. 3 East 410; 4 John. Ch. R. 368; 2 Sch. and Lef. 330. It would be absurd to suppose that the confidence which the testator had in the knowledge and integrity of his executor, and which induced him to confide to such executor the power of selling and conveying his lands, could extend to unknown persons." to sell and make distribution may be made by an administrator with the will annexed to a court of equity where the terms of the will cannot be carried out without converting the land into money.[12]

Where an administrator with the will annexed purchased, at judicial sale, property in which the testator had owned an interest, and took title in himself as administrator, a subsequent sale by him was not a sale under the will.[13]

XX. TEMPORARY OR SPECIAL ADMINISTRATORS

[§ 2780] A. In General. Administration limited to a certain time, to certain specific effects of decedent, or to the performance of some particular acts, may be granted in various appropriate instances.[14] The power to make such appointments is

[a] Such a statute applies even though: (1) The power to sell conferred by the will was discretionary. Gulley v. Prather, 7 Bush (Ky.) 167. (2) The sale was directed to be made for reinvestment. Robinson v. Ostendorff, 38 S. C. 66, 16 SE 371. (3) The will was probated prior to the enactment of the statute. Blakemore v. Kimmons, 8 Baxt. (Tenn.) 470.

[b] Requisites of valid sale.—Under the act of April 6, 1888, an administrator de bonis non with the will annexed may make sale of the realty of the testator if the will conferred power upon the executors named therein to make such sale. In re Devine, 62 N. J. Eq. 703, 49 A 138; Griggs v. Veghte, 47 N. J. Eq. 179, 19 A 867. But the power of such administrator is declared by this act not to be valid until the terms of sale shall have been submitted to the orphans' court of the county in which the lands proposed to be sold lie and approved by such court. The jurisdiction of the orphans' court to approve or disapprove of the terms of a sale can only be invoked by one who exhibits by proof a right to make sale, if the will has conferred power of sale upon the executors named therein. If the will is one probated within the state, the application must show that he has been duly appointed administrator with the will annexed by some court having jurisdiction to make such appointment. If the will is a foreign one, it must appear that the applicant has been appointed with the will annexed, and also that he has taken such proceedings within the state as will give him a right to act in New Jersey. In a proceeding under this statute the court has no authority to consider or adjudicate upon a claim that the lands descended to testator's heirs at law or were specifically devised by his will and were not within the power of sale conferred by the will, for if the administrator had no authority to sell under the will, an order of the orphans' court under this statute would not confer it upon him. In re Devine, 62 N. J. Eq. 703, 49 A 138.

[c] A foreign administrator with the will annexed cannot sell lands under a statutory provision in the state where the lands are situated. Steele v. Moxley, 9 Dana (Ky.) 137; Brown v. Hobson, 3 A. K. Marsh. (Ky.) 380, 13 AmD 187.

[d] A power of sale to carry out a collateral trust cannot be exercised by an administrator with the will annexed, even under such statutes. Crouse v. Peterson, 130 Cal. 169, 62 P 475, 615, 80 AmSR 89; Nicoll v. Scott, 99 Ill. 529; Hegeman v. Roome, 70 N. J. Eq. 562, 62 A 392; Varick v. Smith, 67 N. J. Eq. 1, 58 A 168; Gehr v. McDowell, 206 Pa. 100, 55 A 851; Evans v. Chew, 71 Pa. 47; Waters v. Margerum, 60 Pa. 39; Harrison v. Henderson, 7 Heisk. (Tenn.) 315.

[e] An implied power to sell land resulting from a charge of legacies thereon cannot be exercised by an administrator with the will annexed under such a statute. Stoughton v. Liscomb, 39 R. I. 489, 98 A 183.

[f] Where no donee of power named.—Where a will contains the direction for the sale of land, but provides for no executor or donor of power to sell, a sale can only be made through the court of chancery; hence a sale by the administrator with the will annexed is void, the statute providing that administrators with the will annexed shall have the same power as the executor had by the will, having no application to a will which provides for no executor. "Such appointment seems to have been originally assumed by probate courts as a matter of necessity. With us it has long been sanctioned by law." Guthrie v. Welch, 24 App. (D. C.) 562, 567.

"No sound reason exists why the surrogate, in the exercise of his authority, should not limit the application of the letters issued by him. We think it rests with him to say, in the exercise of his discretion, what powers should be conferred upon an administrator, and so long as he does not exceed the authority vested in him by law there is no valid ground for assuming that the letters issued by him are unauthorized; he has kept himself within the letter and the spirit of the statute, already cited, which authorizes him 'to direct and control.' In this case he merely allowed the administratrix to institute the first step to be taken for the collection of a claim which existed against the defendant. The law does not prevent or forbid him from issuing letters in the form which he followed; he therein limited the power of the administratrix instead of extending it." Martin v. Dry Dock, etc., R. Co., 92 N. Y. 70, 75.

[a] Where no application for administration in chief is pending, temporary letters cannot be granted. Dock's Est., 7 NYCivProc 237, 3 Dem. Surr. 55.

[b] Qualified appointment.—Where a supposed deceased had not been heard of for about six years and ten months, and there was no other evidence of death, and a grant of administration was required for use in certain chancery proceedings, the court gave the applicant leave to swear that the death had occurred on the date the alleged deceased was last heard of, but directed that the grant should, except in so far as it might be required in the chancery division, remain in the registry until the expiration of seven years from that date. In re Winstone, [1898] P. 143.

[c] Errors in temporary administration proceedings.—Errors and irregularities in a judgment rendered in a temporary administration cannot be corrected in the permanent administration, as they are distinct proceedings and a judgment in one cannot be collaterally attacked in the other. Ball v. Ball, (Tex. Civ. A.) 45 SW 605.

[d] Estoppel to object to appointment.—Where parties interested in the estate fail to move to set aside the appointment of a temporary administrator in apt time, they cannot claim that the appointment was not properly made. Stone v. Haskins, 97 Ill. A. 3.

inherent in courts of probate jurisdiction,[15] and its exercise in a particular case is generally a matter of discretion,[16] although it has been considered that a limited grant should not be made unless strong reason therefor is given,[17] and it is of course necessary to the valid exercise of such power that there should be no executor or administrator capable of acting.[18] A fortiori a special administrator cannot be appointed where there is a regularly appointed administrator acting.[19]

[§ 2781] B. Classes—1. Durante Minoritate. Where the person entitled by precedence to administration or the executor named in a will is an infant, the court may appoint an administrator to serve until such person attains his majority, who is termed an administrator durante minoritate or durante minore ætate.[20] It has been held that if several executors are named and one of them is of full age and capacity, administration during minority need not be granted, because the person of full age may serve, notwithstanding the nonage of the others,[21] but in other cases it has been considered proper to grant such administration because of the minority of one of several executors[22] or persons equally entitled to administration.[23]

[§ 2782] 2. Durante Absentia. If the executor appointed by a will, or the person entitled to the administration of a decedent's estate, is temporarily out of the country, it may be necessary that an administrator be appointed to act during his absence, and such an appointee is termed an administrator durante absentia.[24] This species of administration was granted at common law only before probate or grant of original letters of administration;[25] but in England the power of the court has been extended so far as to authorize a limited grant of administration whenever the convenience of the estate may require it.[26] The person entitled may qualify on his return[27] unless, after an unreasonable absence, he finds upon his return that the estate has been fully settled.[28]

[§ 2783] 3. Pendente Lite. In case litigation arises over the right to administration or the probate of the will, an administrator may be appointed to take charge of the estate while such contest is pending and, until its termination, the appointee being termed an administrator pendente lite,[29] and the appointment may be made where the contest

[a] Circumstances under which appointment not necessary or proper.—(1) Where an administrator during the lifetime of the intestate made payments on his note, held by the intestate, which were not indorsed on the note, the county court is not obliged to appoint an administrator pro tempore, as provided by Rev. St. c 3 § 72, in order to arrive at a settlement with the administrator, the payments made being in no sense a claim against the estate. Emerick v. Hileman, 177 Ill. 368, 52 NE 311 [aff 71 Ill. A. 512]. (2) Under Hurd Rev. St. (1905) c 3 § 11, which authorizes the appointment of an administrator where there is great delay in admitting the will to probate, § 17 which provides that on the granting of letters testamentary the power of the administrator to collect shall cease, and § 72 which authorizes the appointment of an administrator pro tempore to defend for the estate when the executor has filed a claim against the estate, where an executor claimed that certain shares of stock belonging to testator had been transferred to him by testator, and a legatee claimed that the stock had been converted by the executor, there was no authority for appointing a special administrator to sue the executrix to recover assets. Day v. Bullen, 226 Ill. 72, 80 NE 739 [aff 127 Ill. A. 155]. (3) Where the estate of a decedent was in community, and consisted of cash in bank and of an interest in a partnership business in possession of the surviving partner, who was proceeding to wind up the firm affairs, the probate court could not by the appointment of a temporary administratrix authorize her to take possession of partnership assets or interfere with the right of the surviving partner to wind up the partnership business. Man.—Tellier v. Schilemans, 17 Man. 303, 5 WestLR 467; Tellier v. Schilemans, 16 Man. 430.

[a] "The chief reason for granting an administration pendente lite is to collect and preserve the estate until by the determination of a pending controversy it shall be decided whether the decedent left a valid will so that the Orphans' Court may know who is entitled to administer the estate. Until that controversy is finally determined the necessity for the administrator pendente lite continues and in the absence of any provision in the statute to the contrary it must be presumed that the law intends that he shall remain in office. A decedent can have but one valid will and even though a number of papers are produced in the Orphans' Court at the same time each purporting to be his will the controversy as to which if any of the papers in fact constitutes his valid and effectual will is after all but a single controversy and is not ended until all the papers are declared void or some one or several of them taken together are held to constitute his will." Harrison v. Clark, 95 Md. 308, 312, 52 A 514.

[b] Appointment must be special.—The appointment of a general administrator while a contest as to a will is pending is void, as exceeding the power of the court, and cannot therefore be supported as a grant of administration pendente lite. Slade v. Washburn, 325 N. C. 557.

[c] Necessity must be shown in order to warrant the appointment of an administrator pendente lite. In re Morrissey, (N. J. Prerog.) 107 A 70; Tellier v. Schilemans, 17 Man. 303, 5 WestLR 467 [foll Horrell v. Witts, L. R. 1 P. & D. 103].

[d] There must be a contest as to the right to the administration or the executorship in order to authorize the appointment of an administrator pendente lite. It is not sufficient that the persons entitled delay taking out letters. Munnikhuysen v. Magraw, 57 Md. 172; South Brooklyn Saw-Mill Co. v. Dock, 3 Dem. Surr. (N. Y.) 55.

[e] Existence of litigation sufficient.—(1) An administrator pendente lite will be appointed where a bona fide suit is pending, irrespective of the property being in any particular danger. In such case the court follows the practice of the court of chancery in appointing receivers. Bellew v. Bellew, 11 Jur. N. S. 588. (2) Contra In re Marsh, (N. J. Prerog.) 55 A 299 ("The intervention of the court by the appointment of an administrator pendente lite, which will occasion expense to the estate, ought not . . . to take place, unless there is some reasonable ground to apprehend that, if no such appointment be made, there will be loss to the estate").

[f] Controversy as to right to general or limited probate.—An administrator pendente lite may be appointed where the litigation is on the question whether the executors named in the will are entitled to a limited or general grant of probate. In re Dawes, L. R. 2 P. & D. 147.

[g] Contest of codicil not affecting appointment of executor.—If the contest is in regard to the validity of a codicil which does not affect the appointment of the executors, the court will not appoint an administrator pendente lite. Mortimer v. Paull, L. R. 2 P. & D. 85.

[h] Will disposing of real estate only.—Such an appointment is not authorized by the fact that there is a contest as to the probate of a will which disposes of real estate alone. Tooker v. Bell, 1 Dem. Surr. (N. Y.) 52.

[i] Appointment in respect to partnership property.—Where the estate of decedent consists of a share of a business which he was carrying on in partnership at the time of his death, and which was continued by the surviving partner, an administrator pendente lite will not be appointed against the wish of the surviving partner, unless he is dealing improperly with the business. Horrell v. Witts, L. R. 1 P. & D. 103.

[j] Appointment not prejudicial to heirs.—Although in a will contest the original petition named as defendants only the named legatees, instead of all heirs, a temporary appointment was not prejudicial to the executor, also a legatee, an amended petition making all the heirs parties being subsequently filed. Achor v. Sullenger, 137 Mo. A. 372, 117 SW 1191.

[k] When appointment unnecessary.—(1) No appointment pendente lite should be made after the general administrator has fully settled the estate, or where it otherwise appears that there is no occasion for such administration. Elwell v. Universalist Church, 63 Tex. 220; Fisk v. Norvel, 9 Tex. 13, 58 AmD 128. (2) An estate should not be subjected to the cost and encumbrance of such an administration when a rightful and regular executor or administrator whose appointment is not questioned can discharge the duties of the office during the emergency, but the consent of the contesting parties to the special appointment pendente lite obviates objections of this character. Patton's App., 31 Pa. 465; Mortimer v. Paull, L. R. 2 P. & D. 85. (3) Where, on an appeal from a decree removing an executor, it appears that the estate consists of securities and cash deposited in a bank, and that an order made by the lower court restraining the removed executor from disposing of the estate during the pendency of the proceedings has not been appealed from, and there is no claim that the estate has been diminished in value since the appeal was taken, the prerogative court will not appoint an administrator pendente lite on a motion based on the misconduct for which the executor was removed. In re Marsh, (N. J. Prerog.) 55 A 299. (4) Where a will names no executor and merely devises real estate, a controversy over the probate thereof does not warrant the appointment of a temporary administrator or receiver under a statute providing for a temporary appointment "where delay necessarily occurs in the granting letters testamentary or of general administration." Tooker v. Bell, 1 Dem. Surr. (N. Y.) 52.

[l] Administration pro tempore.—A comparatively early statute in Texas provided for the appointment of an administrator under the designation of an administrator pro tempore for substantially the same purposes and with like powers and limitations of an administrator pendente lite. a decree removing an executor.[33]

Appointment pending contest of will. It was formerly considered that an appointment pendente lite could not be made where the litigation was with respect to a will, because the power to grant letters of administration was strictly limited to ascertained cases of intestacy.[34] But this strictness was afterward relaxed because of the necessity that there should be a temporary keeper of the goods of decedent while the controversy lasted, and it was finally settled that the power to make such an appointment extended to cases involving a contest of a will as well as to cases of intestacy.[35] It has been held that the probate court has jurisdiction to suspend an executor and appoint a temporary administrator pending a contest of the will;[36] but the more general view is that the power to make such an appointment is limited to cases where a contest over the will arises before probate, and cannot be exercised where a will which has been admitted to probate is subsequently contested,[37] or pending an appeal from the probate of a will.[38] It has also been held improper to appoint the executor special administrator pending an appeal from a judgment setting aside the will.[39]

After the estate has been finally settled by a general administrator no appointment of an administrator pendente lite can be made.[40]

Limited appointment. Where the necessity for the appointment of an administrator pendente lite is shown as to a portion of the estate only, an appointment limited to such portion should be made.[41]

The reversal of a decree admitting a will to probate, thus terminating the authority of the executor, does not revive the appointment of an administration to whom temporary letters pending the contest of the will were issued.[42]

[§ 2784] 4. Ad Litem. A special administrator is sometimes appointed for the sole purpose of supplying a necessary party to an action to which decedent was, or his estate is, a necessary party, and the administrator so appointed is termed an administrator ad litem,[43] but the power to appoint such administrators should be strictly construed and exercised only in cases of necessity.[44] Such an appointment is authorized if the administration is vacant or the representative is disqualified,[45] and where the regular administrator is interested adversely to the estate, it is the duty of the court under some statutes to appoint an administrator ad litem,[46] but ordinarily such an administrator will not be appointed where there is a general administrator.

[a] Foundation of representative's claim.—N. Y. Code Civ. Proc. § 2559 et seq, authorizing appointment of an administrator with limited letters, "where a right of action is granted to an executor or administrator by special provision of law," is not limited to cases where the right of action is given by the law

istrator.[47] It has been held that since there can be but a single administration of the affairs of an estate, a special administrator cannot be appointed to litigate a question of title with the executor, who has put himself into a position in which he cannot represent the estate and at the same time assert title in himself adversely to the estate.[48] An administrator ad litem will not be appointed where all the parties interested in the final settlement of the estate are before the court.[49]

The term administrator ad prosequendam has been applied to an administrator appointed to prosecute an action for the death of decedent,[50] or to represent the estate of a deceased mortgagee in a foreclosure suit brought by a prior mortgagee.[51]

[§ 2785] 5. Ad Colligendum.[52] Administration is sometimes granted for the sole purpose of collecting and preserving the goods of the decedent, and such a grant is termed "ad colligendum" or more properly "ad colligendum bona defuncti."[53] It has been held that, when there are neither kindred nor creditors, this class of administration only is authorized.[54] The administrator ad colligendum is the mere agent or officer of the court and may be compelled at any time to give way to an administrator in chief;[55] and he is not such a representative of the estate as to require claims to be presented to him in order to avoid the statute of nonclaim.[56] While grants ad colligendum, in the absence of a statute to the contrary, are applicable to personal estate only, a statute directing that, where a person dies possessed of real estate, the heir at law shall be equally entitled to administration with the next of kin makes such grants applicable to real estate.[57]

[§ 2786] 6. Other Temporary or Special Appointments. Various other occasions may arise for requiring a temporary administrator; as where the testator appoints a person to be his executor at the expiration of five years,[58] or the representative duly appointed has become disabled by sickness or temporarily insane.[59] So also an administrator may be appointed to act until a will is presented and proved,[60] especially where the will is left in some distant place,[61] or has been lost.[62] A temporary appointment is also proper where delay necessarily incurs in the granting of letters testamentary or of administration,[63] or a limited grant of administration may be made in order to effectuate some particular purpose.[64] of New York. Public Serv. Electric Co. v. Post, 257 Fed. 933.

[b] Claim to property.—An appointment of an administrator pro tempore is unnecessary where executor claims property as his own in opposition to the estate he represents, Administration Act § 72, authorizing such appointment only where the administrator or executor files an out-and-out claim against the estate. Heinrich v. Harrigan, 288 Ill. 170, 123 NE 309.

[e] Claim of dower by administratrix.—Where decedent's widow who was also his administratrix sued in both capacities to enforce an alleged equitable conversion by a contract concerning certain land in which defendant was interested, and also asking for dower out of the proceeds, it was held that while there was no antagonistic interest between the widow and the administratrix, so far as enforcing the conversion was concerned, which would increase the personal assets of the estate, her claim for dower was antagonistic to her position as administratrix, and hence an administrator ad litem should be appointed. [§ 2787] 7. Special Administration under Statutes. Under modern policy, and more especially as the result of legislation in various American states, the enumerated occasions for temporary or limited grants lose much of their force, inasmuch as the appointment of a special or temporary administrator wherever an emergency arises which calls for such appointment is distinctly provided for.[65] Such an appointment may, however, be made only in the cases and under the circumstances provided for by the statute.[66]

[§ 2788] C. Selection. In a few jurisdictions the right to special administration is in the same persons as would be entitled to general letters testamentary or of administration, or administration with the will annexed,[67] but in the absence of statute no such rule prevails,[68] nor is the selection limited to those entitled to ordinary administration.[69] In any event, where selection is permitted, the choice is a matter to be controlled by the sound discretion of the court in view of the situation,[70] aided by the consent and confidence of those who may be interested in the estate or in the permanent appointment.[71]

Where there is a conflict of interests, a disinterested person should be appointed temporary administrator,[72] and not one of the litigants.[73]

Where a will is contested, the person therein named as executor may, according to some authorities, be appointed temporary administrator,[74] but who was entitled to the whole personal estate of the deceased father wrote from a foreign country to a cousin in England, giving him directions as to securing the amount of the property and transmitting a sum of money to him, an administration was granted to the cousin limited to carrying into effect the directions contained in such letter. In re Drinkwater, 31 L. J. P. D. & Adm. 93.

[b] Purpose not calling for grant.—Where a woman died in France leaving personal estate of her own in England, and it was alleged that by the law of France her husband, from whom she had eloped, could not establish his claim to her property, without a grant from the court of probate, the court had no jurisdiction to make a limited grant to enable him to establish his claim in the courts of France. 74. Renshaw v. Williams, 75 Md.

whether it is proper to appoint the executor is a question which must be decided in each case according to the peculiar facts and circumstances presented.[75] It has been considered that the executor should not be appointed as against the objection of the contestants of the will,[76] or where he has an interest in any degree hostile to the estate,[77] nor should an executor who is charged with undue influence in procuring the execution of the will be appointed.[78] Indeed the view has been expressed that in case of a will contest the executor should not be appointed at all,[79] the proper person to receive the temporary appointment being the one who would be entitled to administer in case of intestacy.[80]

In case of administration durante minoritate the usual practice is to appoint the guardian of the person entitled,[81] but the court is not required in all cases to appoint the guardian,[82] the selection of an administrator durante minoritate, as in other cases of special or temporary administration, being in the discretion of the court.[83]

[§ 2789] D. Proceedings for Appointment[84]—1. Jurisdiction. Ordinarily, a special or temporary administrator should be appointed by the court having authority to grant letters testamentary or of general administration,[85] and the power of appointment cannot be exercised by a court to which an appeal or writ of error has been taken in proceedings contesting the will.[86] Under a statute authorizing the appointment of administrators ad litem in probate and chancery courts, and other courts having chancery jurisdiction, such appointments may not be made by law courts,[87] except in cases of equitable cognizance,[88] or by appellate courts.[89] The court in which an action to set aside a will is pending has sometimes, under statute, power to appoint an administrator pendente lite.[90] It has been held that, where a party dies pending a suit, the court in which the suit is pending has power to appoint a special administrator to conduct or defend the case,[91] but this has also been denied.[92]

Jurisdiction must appear. It has been held that the facts giving jurisdiction to a county court under a statute regulating its power to appoint curators must be made to appear,[93] and in the absence of such facts it is not error for a circuit court to render judgment on appeal holding an order of the county court appointing a curator to be void.[94]

[§ 2790] 2. Who May Move for Appointment. Any person interested in the estate may apply for the appointment of a temporary or special admin-

[a] The reason for such an appointment is that "other things being equal, it is certainly advisable to save the estate the large increased expense which would result from the selection of any other person than one of those named as executor." Matter of Sterns, 9 NYS 748, 2 Conn. Surr. 272.

[b] Rule subject to exceptions.—The rule which would ordinarily require the court to refuse to appoint an executor the temporary administrator of the estate of a decedent whom he is charged with having unduly influenced in the execution of a will is not so absolute and inflexible as to admit of no exception. Matter of Hilton, 29 Misc. 532, 61 NYS 1073, 1 Mills Surr. 337.

[c] Where the allegations of improper influence are general and conjectural and the majority of persons interested both numerically and in amount of interest desire the appointment of the executor as special administrator pending the contest, and it is to the interest of the estate so to appoint him, he should be appointed. istrator,[95] or the court may make such an appointment on its own motion [96] or even on the application of a person not a party to the controversy.[97]

[§ 2791] 3. Time for Application. An application for the appointment of a temporary or special administrator pending proceedings for the revocation of letters testamentary is premature,[98] and the filing of a petition for appointment of an administrator pendente lite when no will has been lodged for probate,[99] or when one has been lodged and no citations have been issued,[1] and before the court has taken action in the matter of probate,[2] is a nullity.

[§ 2792] 4. Notice. It has been held not necessary that there be notice of the proceedings for appointment of a temporary or special administrator,[3] and also that, where a petition has been filed for the probate of a will, the proponent alone is entitled to notice where no other person has appeared in the proceeding.[4]

[§ 2793] 5. Petition. It is usually considered necessary that there should be a petition for the appointment of a temporary or special administrator,[5] and an order appointing a special administrator and purporting to be made in a formal proceeding on a written application is outside the court's jurisdiction, where no application was on file, although the petitioners for general letters had orally requested the appointment.[6] But there is also authority for the view that a petition is not necessary.[7] An application alleging that decedent left a will which petitioner does not believe is his last will, and that there is another alleged will which has not been offered for probate, without explaining such delinquency, is not sufficient to call for the appointment of a temporary administrator.[8] A petition alleging that according to the information and belief of the petitioner decedent left no valid will is insufficient unless it alleges the source of the information and the grounds of the belief.[9]

[§ 2794] 6. Evidence. The death of the alleged decedent must be shown,[10] but much weaker proof is sufficient to raise the presumption of the death of an absentee on an application for the appointment of a temporary administrator to collect, than would be required if appointment of a permanent administrator was sought.[11]

[§ 2795] 7. Order and Entry or Filing Thereof. Under some statutes an order appointing a special administrator may be made either by the court [12] or by a judge in chambers.[13] The order should not contain provisions which are merely declaratory of the law [14] or which relate to the compensation of the administrator.[15] Where the order recites sufficient grounds for the appointment of a temporary administrator, it is not affected by a further recital of reasons not sufficient to justify the appointment.[16] A statute providing that appointment of a special administrator may be made at any time and must be made by entry upon the minutes of the court specifying the powers to be exercised by him has been held not mandatory as to the entry of a minute order,[17] so that the appointment was complete when the order was signed, and failure of the clerk to enter it on the minutes would not invalidate it.[18] Where a petition stated facts authorizing the granting of full letters, but merely prayer for temporary administration, and the decree granted temporary administration to plaintiff, and full letters were issued thereon, the error, if any, was corrected by a nunc pro tunc order, amending the first order, and ratifying all proceedings taken under it.[19] Where an order appointing an administrator ad prosequendum, with the petition, was handed to the proctor obtaining it for filing, his destruction thereof before filing could not operate as a vacation of the order.[20]

[§ 2796] 8. Appeal. It has been held that an appeal will lie from an order appointing [21] or refusing to appoint [22] a temporary or special administrator; but there is also authority for the view that an order appointing a special administrator is not appealable.[23] Where two persons, each presenting a will and objecting to the will presented by the other, each applied for the appointment of an administrator pendente lite, and the court appointed a disinterested person not related to either petitioner, neither petitioner was "a party aggrieved" by the order, entitled to appeal.[24] Where a decree expressing the necessity for and appointing an administrator pendente lite of a decedent's estate is not appealed from in the time required by law, an appeal from a subsequent decree appointing another, and fixing the amount of security to be given, and also reciting the former decree, and declination of the first appointee to serve, does not call in question the necessity for the appointment of such administrator.[25] An appeal from the granting of special letters did not affect the court's jurisdiction over a special administration of the estate previously instituted, so as to invalidate an order made therein.[26]

[§ 2797] E. Bond. A temporary or special administrator is required to give bond[27] the same as any other administrator.[28] However, on a grant of limited administration a bond is sometimes taken in a merely nominal penal sum;[29] and a special administrator is sometimes permitted to deposit the personalty in court and thus have his bond reduced.[30]

[§ 2798] F. Setting Aside Appointment. On the filing of a formal will, with petition for probate, after the designation of the widow as temporary administratrix in proceedings based on intestacy, in which no letters have been issued, the surrogate's court has inherent power to vacate the designation and stay the proceedings until the issue of testacy is determined,[31] and is bound to do so on its own motion without any petition.[32] A motion to set aside an appointment of a temporary or special administrator may be made by any of the parties interested in the estate,[33] and their failure to move will estop them from claiming that the appointment was not properly made.[34]

[§ 2799] G. Duration and Termination of Authority. The appointment of a temporary or special administrator normally continues effective until permanent letters are granted,[35] and the recipient of such letters qualifies.[36] His powers are determined when the reason for his appointment ceases to exist and a general administrator is appointed or an executor qualified;[37] or, where an appointment is made for a limited period, or until the happening of some event, the power of the appointee ceases with the expiration of such period or the occurrence of such event.[38] In such case it is usually considered by the courts that a formal order of removal or revocation of the letters is not necessary,[39] although the letters are often revoked under such circumstances.[40]

during whose minority administration was granted does not terminate the administration.[42]

The powers of an administrator durante absentia usually terminate on the return or death of the executor or person entitled to administer.[43]

Administrator pendente lite. Upon the termination of the litigation, there is no further need of the services of an administrator pendente lite and his authority ceases.[44] But when an appeal is taken after judgment entered, the administration pendente lite continues or revives,[45] and where the appeal relates to the validity of an alleged will the authority of the administrator continues until the final result is certified to the probate court.[46]

An administrator ad colligendum is liable to be superseded at any time,[47] and his authority necessarily terminates on the appointment of an executor,[48] or the issuing of letters of administration with the will annexed to another person.[49]

[§ 2800] H. Powers, Duties, and Liabilities—1. Administrators Durante Minoritate. An administrator durante minoritate has, during the minority of the executor, the same authority as an ordinary administrator.[50] He may exercise a power of sale given by a testator to his executors if such power could be exercised by an administrator with the will annexed,[51] and has the power to assent to a legacy if there are assets for the payment of debts.[52] He has the same authority as an ordinary executor or administrator to retain for his own debt,[53] and he has a further right to retain for a debt due the infant executor.[54] Under the old practice scire facias might issue against the executor, upon his reaching majority, upon a judgment obtained against the administrator durante minoritate.[55] The administrator durante minoritate is liable for a devastavit to the executor who qualifies after coming of age.[56]

[§ 2801] 2. Administrators Durante Absentia. An administrator durante absentia is such a legal representative as to be empowered to assign a leasehold of decedent.[57] The authority of an administrator durante absentia does not become void upon the death of the absent executor but only voidable.[58] A suit begun durante absentia does not

"If it be error to revoke the appointment of an administrator pendente lite while the executor remains a minor, or while he remains absent from the State, it must be equally error to revoke such appointment while the contest over the will is still in progress. No reason can be urged why revocation of letters granted during minority or absence should not occur during those periods, 'during the time of such contest.' In the old law, the words were 'during such contest.' [R. S. Laws of 1825, p. 94, sec. 6.] At the revision of 1835, the words 'at the time of' were added (R. S. 1935, p. 42, sec. 9), as if to give emphasis to the other words of the section by those which were subsequently added. The administrator thus appointed 'during the time of such contest,' is commonly called an administrator pendente lite, which means an administrator 'during litigation.' . . . Now, 'lis' means 'a suit, action, controversy or dispute,' And 'dispute is a conflict or contest.' 'Controversy is a disputed question; a suit at law.' And 'lis pendens' is 'a pending suit.' . . . So that, so long as the lis continues pendens, so long does the administrator appointed during litigation, remain a provisional administrator. And the pendens of the lis is not disturbed nor in any manner affected by the fact of an appeal taken from the circuit court to this court. [Real Estate Sav. Inst. v. Collonious, 63 Mo. 290; Gilman v. Hamilton, 16 Ill. 225; Krug v. Davis, 101 Ind. 75.] The litigation or contest still goes on; and the power of the temporary administrator still remains unaffected by the varying fortunes or vicissitudes of the pending controversy." [§ 2802] 3. Administrators Pendente Lite. An administrator pendente lite has been said to be not properly the representative of decedent, as is the general administrator, but rather an appointee or officer of the court,[61] his office closely resembling that of a receiver in chancery.[62] His duties were originally merely to collect the effects,[63] file an inventory,[64] and hold and care for the property of the estate until the pending suit terminated;[65] but in the more modern practice he sometimes has the right to pay debts of the estate,[66] and may even sell the effects of the estate where a sound discretion warrants such action.[67] It is also held that in case it appears that there is not sufficient personalty to pay debts, he may apply to the court for, and obtain authority to take possession of real estate and collect the rents thereof.[68] Indeed so far as administration, as distinct from distribution, is concerned, an administrator pendente lite has, under modern practice, the same rights and duties as an ordinary administrator,[69] and all lawful acts done by him are binding on the estate.[70] His authority does not, however, extend to the payment of legacies or making distribution of the estate.[71] Inasmuch as it is his duty to collect the effects of the estate, he is entitled to the possession of decedent's personalty,[72] and may maintain an action to recover a debt due the estate,[73] or any other action necessary to protect and preserve the estate.[74] He has also been held entitled to bring ejectment against any person, whether the heir or next of kin or any other person whatsoever, who keeps possession of the testator's real or leasehold estate,[75] but this can be done only under special circumstances, for an administrator pendente lite has no more rights with respect to the real estate than a regular administrator would have.[76] An administrator pendente lite is not liable for interest on money in his hands during pendency of the contest,[77] or at least he should be allowed to keep a reasonable sum to meet contingencies, without being subject to the liability for interest on the sum retained.[78] If, however, he makes use of money of the estate he should be charged interest.[79] If proceedings are begun against the administrator pendente lite, they will be continued against the proper representative of decedent when the duties of the administrator

[a] Limitations.—Expressions to the effect that the office of an administrator pendente lite is more like that of a receiver than of a general administrator, must be understood in the light of the facts under consideration in the particular case. They are not authority for clothing such temporary administrator with the powers of a chancery receiver, or conferring equity jurisdiction on the probate court. An administrator pendente lite is not authorized to wind up and distribute the estate, but to collect it and hold it, making disbursements, if the court so orders; but he is, to all intents and purposes, for the time being, the administrator of the estate, having no greater powers than a regular administrator has and no more comprehensive title. pendente lite have come to an end.[80] When the account of the administrator pendente lite is settled,[81] the proper practice is to award the fund belonging to the estate to the general administrator.[82]

[§ 2803] 4. Administrators Ad Litem. An administrator ad litem has been held not entitled to maintain an action to set aside a tax sale of land which belonged to decedent at the time of his death.[83]

[§ 2804] 5. Administrators Ad Colligendum.[84] An administrator to collect has no power to receive payment of a note due to the estate before maturity,[85] nor has he authority, independently of the order appointing him, to pay out money of the estate for any purpose.[86] He is not a representative of decedent so as to be liable to an action for the nonperformance of decedent's contracts,[87] nor, it has been held, can a replevin suit be brought against such an administrator.[88]

[§ 2805] 6. Special Administrators under Modern Practice—a. In General. The duties of special or temporary administrators under modern practice are generally to collect and preserve the property and to hand over the assets to the general representative when appointed or qualified,[89] and beyond this their powers do not extend,[90] being strictly limited to those prescribed by statute.[91] Sometimes the temporary administrator has only such powers as the court grants him upon appointment.[92] So long as the special administrator remains in office his control over the estate is exclusive.[93] A special administrator appointed pending the contested probate of a will may settle and be discharged without giving previous notice of the contemplated settlement.[94] A proceeding by a temporary administrator for a judicial settlement of his accounts abates upon his death.[95]

[§ 2806] b. Rights and Powers as to Realty. Ordinarily, a special administrator has no right to the possession or control of decedent's realty,[96] and has no power to mortgage[97] or lease[98] the realty,

[a] Effect of statute.—Authority to lease real estate is not given by a statute which declares that the powers of a special administrator are to "collect the personal property, take possession and receive the rents and profits of the real property, preserve and secure the debts, and collect the debts and credits of the decedent." Lee v. Lee, 74 N. C. 70, 72.

[b] Effect of order of appointment.—Where the order of appointment of temporary administrators recited that the application therefor or to sue to recover decedent's real property [99] or to set aside a fraudulent conveyance made by decedent.[1] Power to take possession of and manage the realty is, however, sometimes conferred on special administrators by statute [2] or order of the court of probate jurisdiction.[3]

[§ 2807] c. Compromise of Claims. That a special administrator has power to compromise claims existing in favor of the estate has been both asserted [4] and denied.[5]

[§ 2808] d. Investments and Deposits. A special administrator has no authority to invest any money of the estate in his hands.[6] He should deposit the money, except such an amount as may be necessary to defray current expenses,[7] with some solvent bank or trust company which will refund the money on demand.[8] He should try to obtain interest on the money of the estate,[9] and will be charged with interest which he might have realized where he has failed so to do through neglect.[10] If the special administrator receives any profits from funds of the estate by virtue of his office, such profits belong to the heirs and must be included in his final account.[11]

[§ 2809] e. Expenditures. Under some statutes a special administrator has no authority, independent of his order of appointment, to pay out money of the estate for any purpose,[12] and is not entitled to an allowance for expenditures made without authority.[13] Under an authority to make reasonable expenditures, an item of expense must be shown to have been made in the exercise of prudence,[14] and it is not sufficient to show that the special administrator incurred the expense in good faith for what he believed was for the best interest of the estate.[15] Where the court makes an allowance of fees to the attorney of the special administrator in a suit defended by him, the administrator cannot be allowed for a payment to the attorney's clerk for work which was part of the strict legal duty of the attorney.[16] Where the statute authorizes a special administrator to take charge of decedent's real estate, he is entitled to an allowance in his account for expenses incurred in the management of the property.[17]

[§ 2810] f. Payment of Family Allowance. A special administrator appointed pending proceedings for the removal of the general administrator, the estate being solvent, may be directed to pay the amount which has become due the widow, under an order directing the payment to her of a certain sum for a family allowance.[18]

reject[20] claims against the estate, nor have they any authority to pay debts[21] or to sell property for their payment.[22] But under the statutes of some states the court may in a proper case direct the special or temporary administrator to pay the debts of the estate,[23] and to sell property for their payment.[24] However, even in those jurisdictions where the court has this power, it is limited to the occasions for which provision is made in the statute.[25]

Submission to arbitration. A special administrator has no power to submit a claim against the estate to arbitration.[26]

Appointment to report on claim of general representative. There is sometimes recognized a practice of appointing a special administrator to examine into and report on a claim of the general representative against the estate, and return his findings into court.[27] The allowance of such a claim, by the special administrator, when approved by the court, is attended with the same presumptions as a judgment and can be attacked only in the same manner as a judgment.[28] It is, of course, error for the special administrator to allow the general administrator an amount in excess of what he has claimed.[29]

"In respect to suits he [the special administrator] stands on the same footing as all other administrators, and he is the judge of the propriety of his own cause of action, subject only to his liability when the administration is terminated, and the accounts are settled before the Surrogate. If he fail to institute suits at the instance of parties in interest, upon the offer of sufficient indemnity against costs, he may be held accountable for the loss resulting from his refusal. The authority he receives consists in 'special letters of administration, authorizing the preservation and collection of the goods of the deceased,' and the statute expressly declares that he shall have power 'to collect the goods, chattels, personal estate, and debts of the deceased, and to secure the same at such reasonable expense as the Surrogate shall allow, and for these purposes he may maintain suits as administrator.' The law therefore empowers him to bring suits 'as administrator,' and this too of his own motion, and without being compelled in the first place to ask the permission of the Surrogate." Delafield v. Parish, supra.

[c] An equitable petition to prevent insolvent persons from wasting assets of the estate in their possession may be maintained by a temporary administrator of one who had been an heir at law of another dece-

be ascertained from the statute from which he derives his authority.[31] So under a statute which gives a temporary administrator the power to sue for the collection of debts or personal property of decedent, the temporary administrator cannot institute and maintain an action to recover land alleged to belong to the estate.[32] If the temporary administrator, without authority to institute a suit, begins an action, no subsequent order of the court authorizing the suit can make his act valid,[33] nor can the petition be amended by substituting the general administrator.[34] A special administrator to collect and hold the estate cannot employ himself, or any other attorney, in a contest over decedent's will.[35] A special administrator has power to defend actions against the estate.[36] Such an administrator may be sued by persons beneficially interested in the estate,[37] but an action against him by a creditor of the estate is sometimes precluded by statute.[38]

[§ 2813] i. Effect of Appointment of General Representative. While the authority of a special or temporary administrator ceases on the issuance of general letters testamentary or of administration,[39] his bond does not, ipso facto, become functus officio,[40] and the sureties thereon are liable for his subsequent acts with relation to the estate.[41] The general representative succeeds to all the rights of the special administrator,[42] who must, on the settlement of his account, pay any balance in his hands to the general representative.[43] If the general administrator sues for property in possession of the former special administrator, the latter may show that the property does not in fact belong to the estate and that the possession belongs to him in capacity of guardian.[44]

XXI. COEXECUTORS AND COADMINISTRATORS

[§ 2814] A. In General. It has been laid down that all other things being equal a sole administration is preferred to a joint one;[45] but where the estate is large, or from any cause an intricate and perplexing one to settle, the appointment of two or more administrators may be wise and preferable; hence, in American practice at least, the court may exercise a liberal discretion in this respect, even though interested parties should oppose.[46] When a person entitled to administration of an estate so desires, he may have another competent person associated with him in the office,[47] and such asso-dent. Pollock v. Cox, 108 Ga. 430, 34 SE 213.

[d] Action to recover damages for conversion of assets.—Power to take charge of and preserve the estate and to collect all debts and outstandings owing to it confers no authority to sue for damages for a conversion of assets. [f] Authority from court.—Under a statute providing that the probate court shall "define' the powers" of temporary administrators appointed by it, and declaring that they shall have only such powers as are specifically committed to them, a probate court may authorize a husband, as temporary administrator of his wife's property, to prosecute an action already begun by the husband and wife to recover land belonging to her separate estate. [a] Illustrations.—(1) A statute authorizing the special administrator to maintain actions for the purpose of collecting goods, chattels, and credits, or actions which will aid him in caring for, gathering, or securing crops, or in preserving the property, does not authorize him to maintain an action in his official capacity to set aside a deed made, executed, and delivered to a third person by a decedent in his lifetime. Larson v. Johnson, 72 Minn. 441, 75 NW 699. (2) Nor does such a statute authorize him to sue for and recover goods and chattels which have been fraudulently conveyed by decedent in his lifetime, although the assets of the estate may be insufficient to pay the debts. [b] Testate estate.—The right to an associate appointment is not limited to cases of intestacy, but a person who is legally entitled to letters of administration with the will ciate need not be selected from the class next entitled to the administration, nor is their consent necessary;[48] but it is only with the consent of the person entitled to administer that the appointment can be made.[49] It has been held that the probate court has no power to appoint a coexecutor while its decree appointing an executor stands,[50] but the court has appointed an additional administrator against the protest of one already appointed.[51] An executor and an administrator cannot be joined,[52] and hence the appointment of an administrator as the associate of an executor is void.[53]

Judicial trustee. In England the chancery court is empowered by statute to appoint a judicial trustee to act with an executor or administrator.[54]

[§ 2815] B. Authority—1. In General. With respect to the representation and management of their decedent's estate, coexecutors[55] and coadministrators[56] are regarded in law as one person, and consequently the acts of one of them in relation to the regular administration of the estate are deemed to be the acts of all, inasmuch as they have a joint and entire authority over the whole property.[57] A distinction between the two classes of representatives has been drawn, to the effect that, although each executor represents the testator, all the administrators represent the intestate, and hence a single administrator cannot bind his associates,[58] but this distinction has not been followed generally.[59] So also some cases hold that, where assets or funds arising from the disposal thereof are in the joint custody of the representatives, their action with relation thereto must be joint,[60] while other cases do not recognize such a rule,[61] and it has also been held that without regard to the authority of a coexecutor to act individually, acquiescence of the annexed may have another person joined with him, although such other person is not in his own right entitled to letters. Matter of Moehring, 24 Misc. 418, 53 NYS 750, 2 Gibb. Surr. 540.

[a] Not bound to transact business in presence of attorney of coexecutor.—Where testator appointed three executors, one of whom was his daughter, the other two were not bound to transact business pertaining to the estate in the presence of the daughter's son, who was her personal attorney, and who made himself obnoxious to such executors. [b] When acts of one not binding on the other.—A testator by his will appointed an executor and executrix, and the executrix was given a life interest in the testator's property with remainder to the executor. Among the assets was a mortgage, which was left to the possession of the executrix. She pressed the mortgagor for payment, and he told her that in order to raise the money, he would have to be intrusted with the title deeds, which she accordingly sent him. The mortgagor used the title deeds to obtain money from a bank, but did not pay off the mortgage, and after the death of the executrix it was found that the mortgagor had returned to her only the mortgage deed and not the title deeds. It was held that the acts of the executrix could not affect the rights of the executor and that he was entitled to priority over the bank with respect to the mortgage debt, out of the assets of the mortgagor. other executors in similar acts may protect the person dealing with him.[62] Again it has been laid down that the rule that one executor may act for all is limited to acts of a ministerial nature and that all must concur in acts involving the exercise of judgment.[63] An executor has no power, by virtue of his office, to sign the name of his coexecutor,[64] nor can such power be delegated to him by his coexecutor;[65] but it has been held that one administrator may ratify the act of another administrator in signing his name.[66]

The fact that the will provides for salaries for some of the executors but not for others does not evidence an intent that the executors to whom salaries are given shall have the principal charge and control of the estate, or that their decisions shall be controlling where differences arise between them and their associates.[67]

[§ 2816] 2. Executors Acting as Trustees. As a general rule executors, although clothed with an ultimate duty to act as trustees, are not, until they so act, compelled to act jointly as is the case of trustees generally;[68] but special duties imposed by the will may be such as to demand joint or majority action,[69] and the rule that one may act for all does not apply to any acts which are done as trustee rather than as executor.[70]

[§ 2817] 3. Collection of Assets. Each executor[71] or administrator[72] has the right to receive all debts due the estate or other assets which may come into his hands and may discharge the debtors.

Effect of bar against one representative. The right to enforce claims due the estate is joint to the extent that a bar as against one representative is a bar as against all.[73]

[§ 2818] 4. Custody of Assets. Generally speaking the rights of coexecutors or coadministrators to the custody and control of assets belonging to the estate are equal,[74] and the possession of one is regarded as the possession of all,[75] unless the one who has actual possession holds it under a claim of individual ownership.[76] One representative has no right to prevent his associates from collecting the assets of the estate or holding them in their possession for the purposes of administration,[77] unless in case of mismanagement or of existing or impending insolvency, when a representative may be enjoined from acting further and compelled to restore the assets in his hands,[78] or a receiver may be appointed,[79] who may act with the remaining solvent executors if they consent; otherwise there should be an appointment generally.[80] Contracts between executors as the custody of assets may be sustained,[81] and when the will gives to one executor full possession and control of the assets the other executor is not entitled to the joint custody thereof.[82] The surrogate has sometimes, under statute, power to compel moneys of the estate to be deposited to the joint credit of coexecutors.[83]

[§ 2819] 5. Custody of Books and Papers. The title of coexecutors to books and papers is equal; each is entitled to inspect and to know what they contain,[84] but a majority may agree in whose manual custody they shall be.[85]

[§ 2820] 6. Sale and Transfer or Assignment of Assets[86]—a. In General. As a general rule one of two or more executors possesses the power of selling and disposing of the personal assets of the estate as fully as if all join in the act of transfer;[87] and the same has been held to be true of administrators,[88] although this has been denied.[89]

[§ 2821] b. Indorsement and Transfer of Negotiable Instruments. One coexecutor[90] or coadministrator[91] may assign a note made payable to decedent. It has been held necessary that all the representatives should join in the transfer of an obligation taken to the representatives jointly,[92] but there would seem to be no reason for such a requirement where the obligation is in fact an asset of the estate, and it has accordingly been held that such an obligation may be transferred by a single representative.[93]

[§ 2822] 7. Allowance and Payment of Claims. The authority of one of several representatives to allow a claim against the estate has already been discussed.[94] As a general rule payment by one of two or more joint executors has the effect of a payment by all.[95] Where, however, a claim is opposed and the executors make different pleas, the court should proceed upon the plea which is most favorable to the estate.[96] One of several executors may retain assets in satisfaction of his own claim against the estate where there is no fraud.[97]

[§ 2823] 8. Contracts. Since, as the rule is generally stated, a coexecutor or coadministrator cannot act singly with regard to those acts which may affect the personal responsibility of his corepresentative,[98] he cannot, by his individual act, create a debt against the estate[99] or make a new contract with respect thereto so as to bind his associates.[1] One representative may, however, ratify a contract of another with reference to the administration of the estate.[2]

Contract of sale. Where the will has conferred on two executors the power to sell the testator's real estate, one of the executors cannot bind the other by agreeing to a change in the terms of a contract of sale.[3]

surrogate can direct and control the conduct of executors only in the manner prescribed by statute. He cannot compel one executor to transfer to the other funds of the estate for the purpose of paying counsel. Thompson v. Mott, 1 Dem. Surr. (N. Y.) 32.

Sale and conveyance of real property generally see infra § 2831.

debt barred by the statute of limitations has already been discussed.[4]

[§ 2824] 9. Deposits. Where a deposit has been made by the executors to their joint account, one cannot make a valid check thereon or receipt therefor.[5]

[§ 2825] 10. Investments. When a power of investment is conferred on the executors by the will, they become subject to the rule applicable to trustees requiring joint action.[6] But the rule that payment of a debt due the estate may be made to one of several executors[7] applies to payment of a mortgage held by executors as trustees under the will.[8]

[§ 2828] 13. Releases. The power to collect assets of the estate[13] confers on a single representative the power to release an obligation evidencing or securing a debt to the estate;[14] this power has been held to extend to cases where the obligation has been taken to the representatives jointly,[15] although this has been denied.[16] A single representative cannot, however, release a security except on payment,[17] or release a promise made to an associate individually.[18]

[§ 2829] 14. Submission to Arbitration. One of several representatives may submit to arbitration a matter which would have been properly submitted had he been the sole representative.[19]

[§ 2830] 15. Confession of Judgment. Although it was held at one time that one of several executors or administrators could bind the others by a confession of judgment,[20] the contrary rule is now well established.[21]

[§ 2831] 16. Sale and Conveyance of Real Property. At common law a mere naked power of sale as distinguished from a power coupled with an interest could not be exercised by less than the entire number of executors named in the will.[22] This rule was modified by statute as to cases in which a portion of the executors refused to qualify and act,[23] and as so modified was adopted as a portion of the common law of the United States.[24] Accordingly, the general rule in the United States now is that a power of sale, unless expressly restricted, may be exercised by the representatives who qualify or survive,[25] and the same rule obtains in Canada.[26] In some jurisdictions the renunciation of executors who fail to act must be formal and of record to enable the other executor to convey,[27] but in others it may be established as any other fact.[28] All who have qualified must join in conveying,[29] unless, as is sometimes the case, the statute permits a sale and conveyance to be made by less than the full number.[30] On the refusal of a coexecutor to join in a proper sale by his associate he may be compelled by the court to do so.[31] A contract of sale by less than the full number may be ratified by those who did not join therein.[32] A coexecutor may dispose of what personal interest he possesses in the estate without the consent of his associates.[33] A deed made by one administrator under order of court, and reciting payment of the purchase money, may be sufficient to convey an equitable title, although a coadministrator did not join therein.[34]

[§ 2833] 18. Mortgage or Pledge—a. Personal Property. The power of individual disposition of decedent's personalty empowers a representative to pledge the assets of the estate for the payment of its debts,[38] and although a pledge has been collusive, for the payment of the representative's individual obligation, yet, where the assets have passed to an innocent purchaser, they cannot be recovered from him without reimbursing him.[39]

[a] Facts showing concurrence.—Where executors expended funds of the estate in securing purchasers for city lots belonging to the estate and advancing money to the purchasers for building purposes, and the mortgages which were taken to secure the price and advances ran to one of the executors, and it was understood between them that when the executor named as mortgagee should qualify as testamentary trustee he was to receive the mortgages as part of the trust fund, and both the executors had joined in making drafts and checks used in the transaction, and when the securities were turned over to the trustee by the executors the mortgages were treated as having been in their hands as executors, there was no merit in a contention that the investments in question were made by the executor to whom the mortgages ran, and not by both the executors as such. Brigham v. Morgan, 185 Mass. 27, 69 NE 418.

[b] Where coexecutors joined in a sale of the land of the testator and the proceeds thereof came to the hands of one with the assent of the other and they joined in a settlement with the purchaser they were equally liable to legatees, etc., for the price of the land. Putting Associate in Possession of Assets. An executor or administrator who, having assets of the estate in his hand, turns the same over to his corepresentative,[55] or who by his own acts enables his corepresentative to obtain possession of the assets of the estate,[56] is liable for the misapplication of such assets by his corepresentative, although he may have acted in good faith,[57] unless there was a good and sufficient reason for his acts,[58] or the will authorized the associate to take exclusive possession of the assets,[59] or provided that no liability should attach because of payments by an executor to a coexecutor.[60] It has been held that creditors only, and not legatees, can hold an executor liable for surrendering assets to his associate,[61] but there is also authority for the view that there is no distinction between the liability to creditors and the liability to legatees arising out of such surrender.[62]

Newfoundl.—Dearin v. Kough, 6 Newfoundl. 154.

[a] Sufficiency of delivery to impose liability.—(1) Under a statute providing that an executor shall not be charged with moneys receipted for by his coexecutor, unless shown to have come into his hands, where two executors went together to a bank and caused the decedent's deposit to be equally divided, and one half credited to one and the other half to the other, and neither afterward had possession of the other's half, one was not liable for the other's defalcation. Nettman v. Schramm, 23 Iowa 521 (court equally divided). (2) It is sufficient to impose liability that an executor to whom a bag of coin was handed in the presence of his associates should hand it to a coexecutor. Langford v. Gascoyne, 11 Ves. Jr. 333, 32 Reprint 1116.

62. Johnson v. Johnson, 11 S. C.

Associate. A wrong done or a duty omitted by the person sought to be charged must lie at the foundation of liability of one representative for the acts or omissions of his associate.[63] It follows that a passive acquiescence in the possession of assets by an associate will not impose liability for his misapplication,[64] unless the corepresentative had reason to suspect that it would occur [65] or was negligent in failing to discover it.[66] But where assets are actually in joint control or possession, one of the corepresentatives cannot avoid responsibility for their proper application by turning them over to the sole control of the other,[67] unless the latter is entitled to possession as distributee or trustee.[68] In no event can one executor or administrator be under any liability with respect to assets received by his associate in some capacity other than that of executor or administrator.[69]

[§ 2840] 5. Permitting Breach of Trust by Associate. Although in general one executor or administrator is not bound to exercise supervision over another,[70] he must use vigilance to protect the funds if the circumstances are such as to create a doubt as to their safety,[71] and he is responsible for a loss resulting from the waste or maladministration of his corepresentative where he could have prevented it, and by his negligence failed to do so.[72] It has been held to be no excuse that he was apparently justified in relying on the integrity of his associate,[73] even although the testator induced the reposal of confidence.[74]

[§ 2841] 6. Insolvency of Corepresentative. The insolvency of an associate does not impose liability on an executor who has not had possession of the assets,[75] unless, after discovery of the insolvency or danger thereof, he has permitted the associate to retain the fund.[76]

[§ 2842] 7. Effect of Joint Receipt. The rule at common law was that, where executors or administrators gave a joint receipt for money, all

[a] An executor who took no part in the administration of the estate and who by the will was not to do so unless the testator's widow (the executrix) remarried, was not liable for a misappropriation of its funds by her and was not bound on her remarriage to demand from her the administration of the trust. MacDonald v. Hanna, 100 Mich. 412, 58 NW 171.

[b] Where the will intrusted the greater portion of the assets to one executor, he being required to carry on decedent's business, his coexecutors were not liable for losses occasioned by his mismanagement where they were guilty of no fraud, and had no reason to believe that he was wasting or misappropriating the assets. were answerable therefor, even though as a matter of fact only one received it, the joint receipt being held conclusive of joint liability.[77] But the present rule is that a joint receipt is only a prima facie evidence of joint possession and any of the representatives joining therein may avoid liability by showing that he joined merely as a matter of form and that the money was never actually in his possession or under his control.[78] Even the early cases made a distinction between creditors and legatees, holding coexecutors uniting in a receipt liable only to the former.[79]

[§ 2846] b. Services. Joint contracts for services impose joint personal liability.[86]

[§ 2847] 11. Deposits. A representative who deposits funds in a bank of which his associate is president, and which is at the time in good standing, is not liable where it fails before certain distributees have cashed checks made payable to them, although they have had opportunity to do so.[87] Failure to examine the bank account of the acting executor for two years is not in itself culpable negligence.[87½]

[§ 2848] 12. Investments. Where one representative knows or has the means of knowing of irregular investments by an associate, he is liable therefor in the absence of fraud or misrepresentation of his associate with knowledge of which he is not chargeable;[88] and where, instead of investing a fund as directed by the will, the executors divided between themselves without security, each is liable for a loss of any part of the bond.[89] So also where executors who are charged with the duty to invest a fund in order to secure an annuity pay the fund to one of their number and make no effort to seek an investment, all are liable for a loss thereof.[90] Where the executors cannot agree as to investments directed to be made by the will, they should apply to the proper court for instructions within a reasonable time.[91] Where an executor has been intrusted with the entire charge of an investment, his coexecutors cannot hold an instrument taken by him, either on his private account or in his representative capacity, free from the taint of usurious interest which he has reserved to himself.[92]

he has not permitted does not impose liability.[94]

[§ 2851] 15. Interest on Funds of Estate. Representatives permitting a devastavit may be charged with interest,[95] although in some cases they may be excused by reason of having acted in good faith.[96] A disagreement as to the manner of investment will not prevent an executor from being charged with interest where he made no application to the court for directions.[97]

[§ 2852] 16. Individual Interest in Transactions. The corepresentatives should not purchase property of the estate from themselves either directly or indirectly,[98] unless upon full disclosure and with the consent of all persons in interest,[99] and they are liable to the estate for any profits made by such transactions.[1] A sale to one of their number is, however, usually regarded as merely voidable.[2]

Contracts made with the acting executor by executors who have not qualified may be sustained in the absence of fraud.[3]

[§ 2853] 17. Collection of Assets. As a general rule one executor or administrator is under no liability with respect to the collection of assets by his corepresentative;[4] but it has been held that, where all the executors joined in the assignment of a bond and mortgage and acknowledgment of the receipt therefor, but allowed one of their number to complete the transaction, in doing which he repaid a large portion of the purchase money received, they were all accountable for the loss.[5] Where assets are doubtful, the representatives should schedule them as such in their inventory to avoid responsibility for their collection,[6] although failure to do so will not impose liability in the absence of negligence in collection.[7]

[b] Permitting coexecutor to use funds.—Executors are liable for the devastavit of a coexecutor where they permitted him to use in his business a fund which the testator directed to be paid to a trustee, and united with him in resisting suits by arose.[9] A representative, in the exercise of a sound discretion, may, it seems, redeem assets wrongfully disposed of by his associate instead of bringing an action therefor.[10]

[§ 2855] 19. Debts Due from Associate to Estate. As a general rule a representative is not bound to collect debts owing by his associates to the estate;[11] but such an obligation may arise by reason of the particular provisions of the will,[12] and notwithstanding coexecutors are equally entitled to the possession of the funds of the estate, a note given by one to the other for a debt due to the estate may be upon a sufficient consideration.[13] Where the administrator would have been liable on his bond for the debt of an associate, he may be compelled to account therefor.[14]

[§ 2856] 20. Liabilities Inter Sese and Contribution. As between himself and his associates each representative is responsible for his own acts of maladministration,[15] but this responsibility may be varied or released by contracts inter sese.[16]

Contribution may be enforced by a representative who has discharged more than his proportion of a joint liability.[17]

[§ 2857] 21. Subrogation. Where one representative has been compelled to make good a loss resulting from the default of a corepresentative, he is entitled to be subrogated to all rights which the estate [18] or the persons beneficially interested therein [19] had against the corepresentative because of his misconduct. But subrogation to the rights of an executor as legatee cannot be permitted where the interest of the legatee has passed to an innocent third person by foreclosure of a mortgage executed by the legatee.[20]

[§ 2858] 22. Accounting and Liability Thereon [21]—a. Accounting by Corepresentatives. An accounting by corepresentatives is in general subject to the same rules as govern accountings by sole representatives, save as to rights and liabilities inter sese arising out of their relations.[22] The liability of an executor for the acts or negligence of

[d] An administratrix, who signed joint checks with her coadministrator, thereby permitting him to draw on their joint account as administrators, whereby he obtained money which he misappropriated, but which he falsely represented to her was to be used in paying debts of the estate, is jointly liable with him therefor. Palmer v. Ward, 91 App. Div. 449, 86 NYS 990.

Pittman v. Myrick, 16 Fla. 692. (2) An agreement between three coadministrators that certain notes made by their intestate, on which one of the administrators was indorser, should be paid in full, with the understanding that if, upon a final settlement of the estate, the assets should prove insufficient for that purpose, the indorsing administrator should make good the deficiency, is binding on the indorsing administrator. [§ 2859] b. Accounting as between Corepresentatives. While in some cases doubt has been expressed as to the authority of a representative to compel his associates to account,[24] it would seem to be the general rule that he may do so in equity,[25] equally where he is a creditor[26] or legatee,[27] and in some states the right has been established by statutes which also provide as to procedure.[28] The amount for which each representative is liable may be determined on a joint accounting.[29]

[§ 2860] c. Liability on Joint or Several Settlement of Account. While the settlement of a joint account is sometimes held to fix a joint liability for the amount found due thereunder,[30] the better rule apparently is that such settlement is not conclusive as to individual liability but may be rebutted by evidence showing with what amounts each representative should properly be charged.[31] Where accountings are separate, liabilities merely consequent upon joint possession of assets do not attach,[32] but where a joint liability of coexecutors or coadministrators in fact exists, it cannot be discharged as to one or more of such representatives by means of making separate accountings.[33]

[§ 2861] D. Acting Executor or Administrator —1. In General. As has been noted in many of the duties of administration the representative may act severally and with regard to such duties the question of whether associates act or qualify becomes immaterial.[34] Where a power has been given to several executors, but only one of them acts as such, the others having resigned, he alone can exercise the power.[35]

[§ 2862] 2. Mutual Agreements or Arrangements. A corepresentative cannot by contract absolve his associate or associates from their responsibility to the estate for its proper administration,[36] nor can the associates by a division of their duties

[b] As to funds converted by a coexecutor, an executor is accountable in the probate court as if never so converted. Baldwin v. Carleton, 15 La. 394.

[c] Where an administrator is charged, on his final settlement, with a note payable to his coadministrator and himself, the equitable title thereto, entitling him to sue thereon in his name alone, is vested in him. Waldrop v. Pearson, 42 Ala. 636.

[d] Laches may bar the right to force a compulsory accounting. Matter of Barrett, 58 App. Div. 45, 68 NYS 589.

[e] The administrator of a deceased executor must be made a party before a distribution of assets or decree as to costs may be made, where the deceased executor was also a legatee and the assets are insufficient to pay all legacies in full, although in his absence the accounts of the survivor may be adjusted. [a] Where an administrator assumes to pay a claim by giving his note therefor as administrator, without purporting to bind his coadministrator, the liability is not imposed on the coadministrator, although the maker of the note is personally liable, and it should be allowed the maker on an accounting. Boyer v. Marshall, 5 NYSt 431.

[b] Credits may be given an executor chargeable with funds misappropriated by a coexecutor of such amounts as the coexecutor would have received under the will, but not for payments made to the estate by the coexecutor after a time when the first executor was not chargeable for misappropriations, such later payments being properly applied to later misappropriations. Adair v. Brimmer, 95 N. Y. 35.

[c] The joint account may be surcharged with the amount of the indebtedness of one of the representatives to the estate. In re Maloney, 11 PittsbLegJ (Pa.) 341.

[d] Presumptions on accounting. —When a joint account has been passed by two coexecutors in which are included assets jointly held and assets charged to the executors severally and there is no evidence showing specifically how the several items of the assets charged were disposed of, it is proper to apply what are the most natural and reasonable presumptions with respect to the order of application as between different classes of assets. These presumptions seem to be: First, that, the debts being credited as if paid by both executors, the payments were made with asset jointly held so far as these may go; second, that as to the application of assets charged to the executors severally, inasmuch as both are equally credited with the payment of the debts and held assets at the time it is presumable that each contributed equally to such payment. Conner v. McIlvaine, 4 Del. Ch. 30.

[e] The decree on such accounting is conclusive between the executors as to the amounts received and paid out by each, and cannot be contradicted by the sworn accounts of the executors, produced by them upon the accounting. White v. Bullock, 20 Barb. (N. Y.) 91.

[b] However (1) executors, uniting in an account, are not liable for uncollected securities for which credit is taken therein; and if securities are taken in their name, and collected by one of them, the other is not liable to the legatees therefor in absence of proof of culpable negligence. Lightcap's App., 95 Pa. 455. (2) While the filing of a joint account is an admission of joint liability for the balance, such joint liability is not a continuing obligation which remains fixed and established as a judicial decree and without regard to subsequent circumstances. apportion their responsibilities,[37] although power to do formal or ministerial acts may be delegated.[38] Where the will nominated three executors and empowered them to act jointly and severally, one of them might sue under a power of attorney from the other two.[39]

[§ 2863] 3. Failure or Refusal to Qualify. A failure or refusal of some of the persons named as executors to qualify will not prevent the others from acting[40] unless there is an express testamentary provision to that effect.[41] Where only one of two foreign executors has taken out letters in the state, he may sue for a debt due the estate in his own name alone without naming the other executor as a party.[42]

[§ 2864] 4. Resignation, Removal, Discharge, Etc. The accepted resignation or the removal of a representative casts the burden of the administration on those who remain,[43] and the retiring representative is not responsible for their further acts.[44] In case one of the representatives has become bankrupt, or wasted or misapplied the assets, or dissipated them through misconduct or negligence, a receiver may be appointed.[45] One of several corepresentatives may be discharged,[46] but such discharge will not be granted where an action against the representatives, connected with the estate, is pending.[47]

[§ 2865] E. Surviving Executor or Administrator—1. In General. Where the administration of an estate is granted to several and one dies, the entire authority and control remain with the survivors.[48] And where several executors are nominated in the will, and one dies before the testator or before qualification, the others are entitled to qualify.[49] The surviving executor is personally liable to the personal representative of a deceased coexecutor for compensation for filing accounts as demanded by him.[50]

[§ 2866] 2. Collection of Assets. The surviving representative is entitled to collect and hold the custody of the assets of the estate,[51] and may sue to recover them from the representatives of his deceased associate,[52] unless the latter has so mingled the assets with his own property that they can no longer be distinguished, in which case the right of recovery for the devastavit is in the persons entitled to the fund and not in the surviving representative for their benefit.[53]

[§ 2867] 3. Debts Due from Deceased Representative. The estate of a deceased representative is to be charged with the assets which were in his hands,[54] and the survivor should present a claim therefor.[55] The estate of a deceased representative is liable only for those acts of administration which occurred during his lifetime.[56]

XXII. REPRESENTATIVES OF DECEASED EXECUTORS OR ADMINISTRATORS

[§ 2868] A. In General. At common law the executor of a deceased executor succeeds as executor of the will of the first testator,[57] and the right of representation may be thus transmitted indefinitely, so long as the chain is not broken by intestacy;[58] but the deceased executor's administrator does not so succeed, nor does a deceased administrator's executor or administrator succeed to the administration of the estate of the original intestate.[59] In the United States the common-law rule has been followed in a few of the states;[60] but the general rule is that the personal representative of a deceased executor or administrator cannot, as such, administer on the estate of the first testator

Tex.—Wood v. Evans, 43 Tex. 175.

[a] A surviving executor has an exclusive right to the possession of the property, and, if he is insolvent, an application for relief must be made by the cestui que trust, and not by strangers, such as are the executors of a coexecutor. Shook v. Shook, 19 Barb. (N. Y.) 653.

[b] Note to representatives jointly.—(1) A surviving administrator may maintain a suit in his representative capacity to recover on a promissory note executed to him jointly with his coadministrator. Wood v. Evans, 43 Tex. 175. (2) Where a note is made to two executors, not described as such, after the death of one of them his executor cannot join with the survivor in an action thereon. Waters v. Creagh, Minor (Ala.) 128.

[c] Settlement by representative of deceased representative.—Where an action pending on a note of the estate by two administrators is, on the decease of one, settled by his representatives, and money received by them from the debtor under the settlement, the surviving representative has an election to affirm the settlement and pursue the representatives of his associate, or disaffirm it and hold the original debtor still liable. Weathers v. Ray, 4 Dana (Ky.) 474.

[d] Satisfaction of judgment.—Where joint executors recover judgment on a mortgage due their testator, and one of them dies, the survivor has the right to receive payment and satisfy the judgment. Packer v. Owens, 164 Pa. 185, 30 A 314.

[e] Where executors who are also sole legatees effect a settlement with a debtor of the estate and take his notes in their individual names, for which they sign a release of the indebtedness as executors, and one of the notes is afterward repudiated by the maker, an action on the portion of the debt represented by it may be brought in the name of an executor who survives for the use of the administrator of the deceased executor payee, and it need not be authorized by the surviving executor where he makes no complaint as to the use of his name. Saeger v. Runk, 148 Pa. 77, 23 A 1006.

[f] The refusal of a coadministrator to proceed against the estate of a deceased associate, to recover for a devastavit, was not in itself a sufficient ground for a federal court to remove the matter from the surviving administrator's hands, in advance of any action by the surrogate court of the state. [a] Survivor not primarily liable.—Where a coadministrator dies with funds in his hands belonging to certain legatees, and his estate is solvent, the surviving coadministrator is not liable to account for the funds in the first instance, but recourse should be had to the executor of the deceased administrator and to the sureties on the executor's bond. Adams v. Gleaves, 10 Lea (Tenn.) 367.

[b] Where one representative dies before the other qualifies.—Where of two executors nominated by will one qualifies and misapplies the assets, and after his death the other qualifies, the latter is not responsible for the misapplication of the funds by the first executor; but the estate of the first executor being solvent, it is the duty of the second executor to collect from it the amount which should have come to his hands as assets of the testator, and for his failure to do so he is liable. Wise v. Murphy, 5 Redf. Surr. (N. Y.) 365.

[c] Where both representatives dead.—Where one executor has paid over assets to a coexecutor, and both have died, an administrator de bonis non must join the representatives of both in a suit on account of the estate in order to avoid circuity of action. Quince v. Quince, 5 N. C. 160.

[a] Time for presentation of claim.—A claim for such funds in the possession of a deceased executor should be presented by testator's surviving executor when the account of decedent as testator's executor is filed in court by decedent's administrator, and the presentation of the claim before that time is premature, Hanbest's Est., 3 WklyNC (Pa.) 520.

[b] Effect of failure to present claim.—Where J, an executor and legatee who received moneys of the estate, died, and W, surviving executor, presented no claim against his estate for the same, the court cannot, on the death of W, after the time for presenting claims against the estate of J had expired, deduct upon distribution the amount collected by J out of the share due his estate. [b] Recovery on note running to executor.—Where an executor loans money of the estate and takes a note therefor, so expressed as to place the legal interest in the obligation in himself personally and dies, his successor in the administration of the estate cannot sue at law upon the obligation under Civ. Code (1895) § 4939, requiring an action on a contract to be brought in the name of the party in whom the legal interest or intestate, but that an administrator de bonis non should be appointed,[61] and the same rule has been laid down in Canada.[62] However, where all the assets have been collected and all claims against the estate paid, and nothing remains to be done save distribution, this may be made, it has been held, by the personal representative of the deceased executor or administrator, without incurring the expense and delay which would result from appointment of an administrator de bonis non.[63]

An action to recover assets of the original estate in such contract is vested; but the suit should be in the name of the personal representative of the deceased executor. Kennedy v. Gelders, 7 Ga. A. 241, 66 SE 620.

Burnley v. Duke, 2 Rob. (41 Va.) 102.

[b] Holding check.—Where the executrix of a deceased administrator holds a fifteen-year-old check made by her testator as administrator, she may be compelled to pay over to the proper claimant thereof, not merely the check, but the money it calls for, if she has so much of the assets of the estate administered by her testator, since the acceptance of the check only would discharge the executrix without assuring the payment of the money represented by it. Matter of Collyer, 124 App. Div. 16, 108 NYS 600 [aff 120 App. Div. 894 mem, 105 NYS 1111 mem].

[c] Proper deductions.—(1) Where an administratrix died before settling the estate, payment of funeral expenses of the intestate and attorney's services in procuring letters of administration by her executrix was not an act of administration on the intestate's estate, but was a payment by the executrix of the debts of her testatrix, which, when approved by the surrogate, the executrix was entitled to deduct from the moneys due by the testatrix to the estate of the intestate. Matter of McDonough, 132 App. Div. 614, 117 NYS 258. (2) Where the executrix of the administratrix paid certain debts for which the administratrix would have been entitled to credit, it was immaterial that the executrix procured the funds from the intestate's bank account. [d] Where no administrator de bonis non with the will annexed has been appointed, the executor of a deceased executor may properly pay over assets of the original testator, which were in the hands of his decedent, to a receiver of the estate which his decedent represented, although his decedent had been ordered to distribute it to creditors. For waste and misappropriation by a deceased personal representative, his own estate may be made to respond by appropriate proceedings against his personal representative,[72] which should be brought by creditors or distributees, and cannot be brought by an administrator de bonis non unless such power is given to him by statute.[73]

Interest cannot be charged against the successor of an executor or administrator for the time during which there is no representative of the original estate authorized to receive the assets.[74]

Trust funds. Where an executor, whose duty was to settle an estate and to hold the residue in trust, dies after discharging all duties of administration, his executors are entitled to hold the trust funds until a trust is appointed for the purpose.[75]

Judgment binding on foreign representative of deceased representative. Where a foreign executor of a deceased administrator had notice of an action by the administrator de bonis non, against the surety on the deceased administrator's bond, to recover a sum converted by the deceased administrator, and the executor selected the counsel representing the surety, he was bound by a judgment against the surety.[76]

[§ 2870] 2. Lien on, and Retention of, Assets for Settlement. In some jurisdictions a lien on assets of the original decedent for charges and outlays on behalf of the original representative is allowed for the benefit of his own estate, and should be enforced by his representative;[77] and the latter cannot be compelled to turn over the estate to the administrator de bonis non of the original estate until he has effected a settlement of his own decedent's estate.[78]

[§ 2871] 3. Participation in Administration. Where the common-law rule of succession of executors has been departed from,[79] and where intestacy has intervened,[80] the representative of a deceased executor or administrator cannot collect or sue on assets of the first estate, or proceed with its general administration,[81] beyond clearing up such personal liability as may have been incurred by his own deministrator has been awarded half the fund in his hands as one of decedent's next of kin, and it appears that the award included sums which the administrator had already distributed to himself, the administrator of the administrator will not be surcharged with the whole amount of the award, but will be responsible for that portion of it only which actually came into his hands. Schelly, (N. J. Ch.) 21 A 1049, a legatee was allowed to maintain a bill against the personal representative of the deceased executor for an order to sell lands which were made subject to the legacy. But in the latter case an administrator de bonis non with the will annexed was appointed pending the action and brought before the court, and in neither case was any question raised as to the right to bring the suit.

XXIII. PUBLIC ADMINISTRATORS

[§ 2872] A. In General. In a number of states the statutes provide for the appointment or election of an officer known as a public administrator, to whom is committed the administration of the estates of decedents under certain circumstances, usually where there is no relative within the jurisdiction who is competent or willing to take out letters of administration.[85]

[§ 2873] B. Appointment or Election and Tenure. The public administrator is sometimes elected,[86] and sometimes appointed by the court of probate jurisdiction.[87] Where the court, by oversight, failed to elect a public administrator at the term when the term of office of the prior incumbent expired, it was proper to elect at a subsequent term of court, the duty being a continuing one.[88] It has been held that one who is appointed to the office of public administrator at any time during an unexpired term of that office is entitled to hold it, in virtue of such appointment, only to the end of the unexpired term,[89] but under a statute providing for an appointment for a specified number of years, but not indicating the beginning or end of the term, it has been held that a public administrator appointed to fill a vacancy holds for the full term of years specified and not merely for the remainder of the term of his predecessor.[90] Under a statute providing that each probate judge shall appoint a general administrator in his county, whose office shall expire at the end of the term of the appointing judge, unless the succeeding judge shall continue him in office, where a judge who had appointed a general administrator was reëlected at the end of his term and neither appointed any other person as general administrator nor made nor entered any formal order continuing the previous incumbent, but continued to treat him as the continuing administrator, and committed the administration of estates to him as such, there was a sufficient continuance of the incumbent, notwithstanding a statute making it the duty of the probate judge to keep minutes of all his official acts and proceedings, and to record them in books, and there was no hiatus in the administrator's tenure of office.[91]

[§ 2874]. C. Eligibility. It has been held that a corporation authorized by statute to act as guardian, executor, or administrator, may be appointed to the office of public administrator.[92]

[§ 2875] D. Source of Authority. A public administrator, in taking charge of the estate upon which letters of administration have been issued to him, is a public officer acting by virtue of his office, and not merely by virtue of the letters issued to him by the court.[93]

[§ 2877] F. Temporary or Permanent Appointment. The statutes with relation to public administrators sometimes authorize committing the estate to his charge only until those to whom the statute gives the right to administer apply for letters,[96] while, under other statutes, when letters are issued to the public administrator, he qualifies as permanent administrator of the estate.[97]

[§ 2878] G. Right to Administer—1. In General. The right of a public administrator is purely statutory and he has no right to administer except in the cases enumerated in the statute.[98] The existence of assets of decedent within the state is usually a prerequisite to the right of the public administrator to administer thereon,[99] and under some statutes the public administrator is authorized to take charge of and administer on an estate only when property of the estate was in his county at the time of decedent's death.[1] The court is not limited, however, in appointing the public administrator to take charge of an estate, to the estate of such persons as die within his county, but he is competent to administer upon the estate within his county of any decedent, irrespective of the place of death.[2] The existence of debts within the state is not essential to the rights of the public administrator to administer on an estate.[3] In a number of states the public administrator is entitled to take charge of an estate only when no persons entitled are present or apply for letters,[4] and it has even been held that the public administrator has no right to take out letters where nonresident heirs have an attorney in fact within the jurisdiction,[5] but if

By section 606 of the statutes, it is provided that it may be appointed and act as guardian, executor, or administrator; and, by section 611, its capital stock shall be taken and considered as the only security required for the faithful performance of its duties, and no other security shall be required, unless the court or officer in or before whom the bond is executed, or some party in interest, demand it. Under these sections of the statutes, it is clear that it can receive specific appointments as guardian, executor, or administrator, and in our opinion there is no reason why it could not be appointed as public administrator. It is true that the statutes [section 3903] say that the court shall appoint some discreet, fit person to act as administrator, etc. In Thompson on Corporations, section 11, 5689, the word 'person' is construed as including a corporation, and by section 457 of the Kentucky statutes of 1903, it is expressly provided that the word 'person' may extend and be applied to corporations. Under these authorities, the county court had the right to appoint appellee as public administrator").

administrator,[16] but it has been held that the nominee of the next of kin is not, as a matter of right, entitled to administration in preference to the public administrator,[17] especially where the next of kin is incompetent.[18] On the other hand, however, it has been held that the nominee of a nonresident widow should be preferred,[19] and that the public administrator is not entitled to administer on the estate of a nonresident, where one of the nonresident's heirs at law who was a bona fide resident nominated another,[20] and preference is sometimes given to the nominee of persons entitled,[21] where the latter are residents.[22] The public administrator is usually entitled to administration in preference to creditors,[23] although this rule is not universal.[24] The public administrator is also entitled to preference over strangers.[25] It has been considered that the attorney in fact of an heir who applies for administration and tenders the requisite security is properly appointed in preference to the public administrator, especially if the heir is present;[26] but there is also authority for the view that the public administrator had a right to administration with the will annexed in preference to the attorney in fact of a disqualified next of kin, except where the will was made by a testator dying domiciled abroad, and was proved by exemplification of a foreign probate.[27]

Discretion of court. As between the public administrator and another person applying for administration the choice sometimes rests in the discretion of the court,[28] and the public administrator may, in the discretion of the court, be preferred to a trust company authorized by statute to administer, because an individual will be preferred to a corporation.[29]

[§ 2880] H. Duty to Administer. A public administrator cannot refuse to enter upon or to continue the administration of an estate which by law he should administer, but may be compelled to act.[30] A probate judge may be compelled by mandamus to make an order compelling the public administrator

[a] Illustration.—The public administrator is preferred to the brother of a decedent who left a father in Ireland, but no wife, issue, or descendants, the brother not being entitled to a distributive share. Matter of Gilchrist, 79 App. Div. 637 mem, 80 NYS 1135 mem [aff 37 Misc. 543, 544, 75 NYS 1055] ("Section 2669 of the Code distinctly provides that the public administrator shall have prior right if there is no next of kin entitled to a distributive share of the estate, who are competent and willing to serve. The petitioner herein, not being entitled to a distributive share of his brother's estate has, therefore, no rights herein as against the public administrator. The cases quoted by the petitioner herein evidently relate to the public administrator in New York county, where the statute is different, and which have, no doubt, misled him into making this application. There is certainly no good and sufficient reason why a different rule should be applied by the Legislature in favor of a public administrator in this county, differing from that of New York county, and there is no good, practical reason why a public official should be preferred to a blood relative in the administration of the affairs of a decedent's estate, but the statute upon this matter is express, and I am constrained to follow the same, and the remedy should be with the Legislature, and not with the court").

[b] Persons entitled to "succeed" to property.—Under a statute giving the brothers of a decedent "when they are entitled to succeed to his personal estate, or some portion thereof," a right of administration prior to that of the public administrator, the brothers are not entitled to priority where the deceased died leaving her mother as her sole heir at law and the mother thereafter died leaving a will bequeathing her property to her two sons, for in such case the brothers do not "succeed" to the decedent's estate. to administer an estate.[31]

[§ 2881] I. Appointment to Take Charge of Particular Estates—1. Necessity for. As a general rule a public administrator is not, merely by virtue of his office, entitled to take charge of and administer estates,[32] but it is necessary that he should be appointed administrator by the court and receive letters of administration.[33] In some jurisdictions, however, the public administrator may act without an order of court where the estate is in danger of loss or damage,[34] although under such circumstances the public administrator's determination is not final on the question of his authority to take charge of the estate, but the final determination is for the probate court,[35] and the authority arising from mere official position is sometimes of a merely temporary character, holding only until regular letters of administration are procured.[36]

[§ 2882] 2. Jurisdiction. In appointing the public administrator to administer any particular estate the court exercises the same jurisdiction that it does in the grant of letters in ordinary cases.[37] Where a public administrator made application to be appointed administrator of a vacant estate, it was error to refuse to take any judicial action in relation to the application merely because a person representing himself to be the brother and heir of the deceased had appeared praying to be appointed administrator, but the application of the public administrator should have been filed and after due notice given tried contradictorily with the application of any other person and the rights of all parties settled by a judicial decree.[38]

[§ 2883] 3. Time for Appointment. In some states the public administrator cannot apply for administration or be appointed to the trust until the lapse of a specified time after the death of decedent,[39] and even apart from statute it has been held error to appoint the public administrator upon the petition of creditors filed nine days after the death where no emergency existed.[40]

[§ 2884] 4. Petition or Application. The appointment of the public administrator to take charge of a particular estate is ordinarily based upon a petition duly filed,[41] but an appointment is not rendered void by the omission of the application to set out a jurisdictional fact which actually exists.[42]

[§ 2885] 5. Notice. As a general rule notice of an application for the appointment of the public administrator must be given to those interested in the estate or having a prior right to administer thereon;[43] but some statutes permit an appointment without notice,[44] and even where the statute requires notice, it has been held that the granting of

[b] Estoppel to deny authority.—If a public administrator receives assets under an order of court directing him to administer, he is estopped afterward to deny that he is administrator, although no letters were issued to him. Thompson v. Bondurant, 15 Ala. 346, 50 AmD 136.

[a] Administrator acts independently of order of court.—Under a statute making it the duty of the public administrator to take charge of the estate of deceased persons in certain specified cases, the public administrator, in taking charge of such estates, acts independently of any order of the probate court. Leeper v. Taylor, 111 Mo. 312, 19 SW 955.

[b] Notice of taking charge.—Where the statute requires the public administrator immediately upon taking charge of an estate, except where he acts under the order of court, for the purpose of administering it, to file a notice of the fact in the office of the clerk having probate jurisdiction, the public administrator's omission to file the notice would not render the whole administration void, especially in view of a provision in the statute that failure to file the notice shall subject the public administrator to a penalty. Adams v. Larrimore, 51 Mo. 130.

[c] Effect of order denying administration.—Although the statute authorizes the public administrator to enter upon his duties by the mere filing of a notice with the clerk of the probate court, an order of the probate court denying administration upon the estate of claimant's deceased wife and awarding him possession is binding until set aside, and the administrator is not entitled to custody upon the mere filing of a schedule. Nelson v. Troll, 173 Mo. A. 51, 156 SW 16.

[d] Collateral attack.—The relation of a public administrator to the estate, when he has taken charge of it under the statute, on his own motion, and filed the required notice, is no more subject to collateral attack than if he had taken charge of it by order of the probate court, or under letters of administration. Matter of Lowenstein, 29 Misc. 722, 62 NYS 819, 1 Mills Surr. 364.

[b] Notice to attorney-general.—A statute providing that, where the surrogate cannot ascertain whether decedent left any person entitled to his estate, a citation must be issued to all creditors of and persons interested in the estate, and to the attorney-general, requiring them to show cause why administration should not be granted to the petitioner, does not, where the surrogate is satisfied that there are persons entitled to succeed to the estate and that they do not live within the state, entitle the attorney-general to notice of proceedings for the issuance of letters of administration to the public administrator, where decedent leaves assets in the county, and does not leave a widow, descendant, or next of kin residing in the state. Matter of Davenport, 142 App. Div. 41, 126 NYS 693.

[c] Where no order was made on the day named in the citation and notice, either adjourning the hearing or determining the matter, the surrogate lost jurisdiction to proceed further without either due service of another citation or a voluntary appearance of the widow and next of kin, and an order made on a day subsequent granting the public administrator's application for appointment without such notice or appearance was void. letters without notice is not improvident.[45] On the other hand, however, the requirement of notice has been held jurisdictional.[46]

[§ 2886] 6. Order. An order reciting an applicant's former appointment as "general administrator of the county," and then directing that "special letters on the estate of the decedent issue to him," shows a grant of general, and not limited, letters, the word "special" being used in contradistinction to "general" or county administrator.[47]

[§ 2887] 7. Effect of Appointment. After an administration has been closed by the transfer of the property to the universal legatee, the appointment of the public administrator does not have the effect of bringing the property back into the succession.[48]

[§ 2888] J. Proof of Authority. The authority of a public administrator is properly proved by a copy of the record of his appointment;[49] but it has been held that, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, it will be presumed that a public administrator taking charge of an estate procured letters of appointment as required by statute.[50]

[§ 2889] K. Official Oath. The general official oath of a public administrator is held to cover the administration of all estates committed to him in his official capacity, so that he is not required to take an oath with respect to each particular estate.[51]

[§ 2890] L. Official Bond. As a general rule the official bond of a public administrator covers estates committed to his care and he is not required to give further security,[52] although the court may exact it when deemed necessary,[53] and the same rule applies with respect to the official bond of an officer who is ex officio public administrator.[54] Where one was public guardian by virtue of being public administrator, and at the termination of his office a new bond was given for him as guardian and curator "in his private capacity," such bond was not an "additional" bond to guarantee the faithful performance of his duty as public administrator.[55]

Where a public administrator was reëlected to the office, and qualified therefor, he became his own successor as representative of an estate administered by him during his first term, and there was no necessity of a special order of the probate court, after his reëlection, to take charge of such estate, in order to charge him and his sureties for his second term of office.[56]

[§ 2891] M. Effect of Termination of Office. Under the statutes of some jurisdictions a public administrator to whom the administration of an estate has been committed during his term of office has the right to continue in charge of the estate after his term of office expires and his successor is elected and qualified,[57] but upon his resignation and the appointment of his successor his functions cease and he should settle and turn over the assets to his successor.[58] A public administrator, by filing his application to administer an estate, does not acquire a vested right to administer, and to the fees pertaining thereto, as against his successor acquiring the office before an appointment is made.[59]

[§ 2892] N. Administration by Other Public Officials. In states or counties where there is no public administrator the administration of vacant estates is frequently committed to some other public officer, such as the sheriff or clerk of the court.[60] But a coroner has no right, by virtue of his office, to ask to be appointed as administrator of a person found dead within his jurisdiction.[61]

XXIV. COLLECTORS AND RECEIVERS

[§ 2893] A. Appointment. The appointment of collectors to have custody and charge of the estate of a decedent until general letters testamentary or of administration can issue is sometimes provided for.[62] At one time it was the practice in England for the court of chancery to appoint a receiver while litigation was pending, although the ecclesiastical court by granting an administration pendente lite might have provided for the collection of the effects of the estate,[63] but now under the statutes[64] the court of chancery will not appoint a receiver when an administrator pendente lite has been appointed by the court of probate.[65] In the United States, under certain circumstances and upon a proper showing being made, the court of probate may appoint a receiver for the estate, who usually corresponds to a sort of special administrator.[66] But where the probate court has ample power to care for an estate by compelling the administrator to account, a receiver need not be appointed.[67]

[§ 2894] B. Powers, Duties, and Liabilities. A collector cannot be sued for a debt of decedent.[68] When a receiver is appointed he does not represent the legatees,[69] but the property passes into the possession of the court.[70] The receiver may be

[g] Clerk may be forced to act.—Johnston v. Tatum, 20 Ga. 775.
[h] Where commitment to sheriff proper.—In vacation, more than three months after the death of the decedent, two of the distributees, who were nonresidents of the state, applied to the clerk of the county court to be appointed administrators of the decedent's estate. They were appointed and executed the bond. The clerk under the statute reported his action to the county court at its next term, at which a resident distributee appeared and filed objections to the confirmation of the appointment, and then applied himself to be appointed. The court refused to confirm the nonresident applicants, and on motion of the latter committed the estate to the sheriff of the county for administration. On appeal the order was affirmed as correct. (2) Where one since deceased delivered a savings bank book to a third person as security for a debt, and his administratrix does not within the time fixed by the court tender the amount of the pledge, with interest to the date of the tender and costs of process, it is proper for the court to appoint an officer to receive the amount of the deposit and make proper disposition thereof. Boynton v. Payrow, 67 Me. 587. (3) The appointment of a receiver is the proper remedy where it appears that the administrator has been removed and the sheriff appointed administrator de bonis non, that the administered assets will not pay the debts, and that the remaining assets will have to be drawn on, which being once administered, the administrator de bonis non could not receive and hold. Harman v. McMullin, 85 Va. 187, 7 SE 349.

[c] Exclusive possession by one of two executors.—The mere fact that one of two joint executors maintains exclusive possession of the securities belonging to the estate, and refuses to deliver them, or any of them, to his coexecutor, there being no evidence of maladministration, or that the interests of the estate are endangered, is not sufficient ground for removing the securities of the estate from the custody of such executor, and transferring them to a special receiver. Burt v. Burt, 41 N. Y. 46.
[d] Where the application is based upon the incompetency of the executrix, her resignation and the appointment of an administrator de bonis non by the probate court will defeat the application. Lunsford v. Lunsford, 122 Ala. 242, 25 S 171.

required to list and pay taxes upon the property of which he has charge.[71]

XXV. INDEPENDENT EXECUTORS

[§ 2895] A. Administration Independent of Control of Courts. In Texas[72] and Washington[73] the statutes authorize administration independent of the control of courts of probate jurisdiction, where the testator has clearly[74] indicated by his will that such is his desire,[75] and the persons taking under the will have assented,[76] and, if required to do so, have given bond to pay the debts of the estate.[77] A will containing such provisions is termed a "non-intervention will,"[78] and the executor named therein is termed an "independent executor,"[79] and need not qualify by taking an oath;[80] but is qualified to act from the time when the will appointing him is admitted to probate.[81]

Only an executor named in the will can act under a provision for independent administration. If no executor is named or if the persons named as executors die or refuse to act, the testamentary provision for independent administration fails and the estate must be administered in the usual manner.[82] So also when an independent executor resigns or is removed, the court of probate jurisdiction has authority to appoint an administrator de bonis non and the administration then proceeds in the usual manner.[83]

Insolvency of the estate does not preclude an independent administration in a suitable case, under a statute general in its terms;[84] and although this species of administration is sometimes limited by statute to solvent estates,[85] such a statute does not take away the right to independent administration of the estate of a testator who died prior to its enactment.[86]

In the absence of statute a testator cannot withdraw administration of his estate from the control of the courts,[87] although a power of an executor to take charge of the assets of the testator's estate, and execute the provisions of the will without administration, in the absence of objection by creditors, has been recognized.[88]

[§ 2896] B. Powers and Liabilities in General. An independent executor has the same powers as any other executor or administrator,[89] and may do without an order of court any act which an ordinary administrator could perform under authority of such an order.[90] He has the same time within which to administer as is allowed to any other representative.[91] He cannot delegate discretionary powers.[92] He may incur reasonable expenses in the management of the estate,[93] and is not responsible for errors in judgment where he has exercised a reasonable discretion.[94] Title to the property of the testator passes to the executor as trustee,[95] and he has the right to determine the proper time for distribution,[96] but he cannot give away the interests of the beneficiaries in property given to them by the will.[97]

[§ 2897] C. Sale of Property. An independent executor may sell the property of the estate for the payment of the debts of the estate or the discharge of any other trust which is directly or exclusively committed to him by the will,[98] and a statute requiring executors in all cases to report sales of real estate to the superior court and giving the court power to set aside or confirm such sale has been held not inconsistent with a power given independent executors by another statute to make sales without reports.[99] Where the executor has only an implied power of sale the purchaser must show that the sale was authorized by the facts,[1] but such proof is unnecessary in case of an express power.[2] The rule of caveat emptor applies to a purchaser from an independent executor,[3] but the purchaser is not bound to see that a proper disposition is made of the proceeds of sale.[4]

[§ 2898] D. Presentation of Claims. General statutory provisions with reference to the publication of notice to creditors to present their claims,[5] and the presentation of claims against the estate of decedent[6] do not apply where the estate is administered by an independent executor; and the presentation of a claim, and its approval by such an executor, do not give it any priority over the claims of other creditors which have not been presented.[7] It is sometimes provided by statute, however, that an independent executor must publish notice to creditors to present their claims and that claims must be presented within a certain time after publication of such notice.[8]

against an independent executor on a claim against the estate,[9] at any time before the estate is fully administered,[10] without prior presentation of the claim as against the estate,[11] provided the prerequisites to independent administration have been complied with.[12] The pleadings need not aver that the executor has assets of the estate in his hands,[13] and a general averment that defendant is the qualified and acting executor authorizes proof that he is an independent executor, and will support an award of execution against him as such.[14] An allegation in one part of a complaint that a person named as executor has executed a note and mortgage will be read with an allegation that he has executed and performed all the terms and conditions of the will, and it will be presumed that such execution was within the administrator's power where it further appears that there was to be an independent administration.[15] In proceedings to foreclose a mortgage executed by an independent executor, an allegation that the will authorized the executor to administer upon the estate without intervention, order, or advice of any court is sufficient to show that letters testamentary were not required in the settlement of the estate.[16] The facts that the estate is insolvent, that there are other debts or grades of indebtedness superior to plaintiff's, and that the only property left by decedent is exempt to defendant as widow, constitute no defense, and do not preclude the recovery of judgment.[17] A judgment against the executor in a federal court in an action to enforce the testator's personal liability on corporate stock is enforceable as is any other claim against the estate,[18] and since the probate court is without power, except such as is especially conferred on it by statute, to control the administration of estate under nonintervention wills, a purported discharge of the executor will not prevent the enforcement of a judgment against him where he has funds of the estate in his hands.[19] Where a widow, administering the estate of her deceased husband not as the survivor of a community, but as independent executrix under his will, caused a business belonging to the estate to be incorporated, it was proper, in a suit by heirs against her to recover property, both real and personal, alleged to have been withheld from the assets of the estate, to adjudge to the heirs their share of the capital stock in the corporation.[20] In a collateral action the question of whether a judgment was such as to authorize execution to issue against the property of the estate in the hands of the executor may be determined by an examination of the pleadings or evidence thereof.[21]

[§ 2900] F. Compensation. A statute providing for the compensation of executors whose compensation has not been fixed by the will applies to independent executors.[22] An extra allowance to such an executor has been held to be a matter to be determined by the court,[23] but this view is opposed to an earlier decision that the court has no authority to allow an independent executor extra compensation for his services.[24]

[§ 2901] G. Protection of Estate in Case of Misconduct. It is sometimes provided by statute that if an independent executor fails to execute the trust faithfully and to take care and protect the interests of all persons taking under the will, it shall be the duty of the court, on petition of any creditor or heir, or person on behalf of minor heirs, to cite the executor before it and have the trust faithfully executed,[25] by requiring the independent executor to take out letters testamentary and administer the estate in the ordinary manner,[26] or by removing him,[27] in which event an administrator de bonis non should be appointed.[28] The persons interested may compel an accounting on the executor's removal,[29] but the court is bound to take notice of the proceedings already had by the independent executor and shown in his report.[30]

[§ 2902] H. Abandonment of Office. Where an independent executor took the oath required by

XXVI. EXECUTORS DE SON TORT

[§ 2903] A. Definition and Nature of Office. An executor de son tort is a person who without authority intermeddles with the estate of a decedent and does such acts as properly belong to the office of an executor or administrator,[32] and thereby becomes a sort of quasi executor, although only for the purpose of being sued or made liable for the assets with which he has intermeddled.[33] The designation is inapt in that it applies the term "executor" to intestate as well as testate estates, and also in that it gives to a person who has merely incurred a certain liability by reason of his intermeddling an official title corresponding with that of a duly appointed representative,[34] and in many states the so-called office of executor de son tort has been abolished by statute, or is considered inconsistent with the prevalent system of administration.[35] The abolition of the fiction of the office does not, however, relieve the wrongdoer from liability for his unauthorized intermeddling,[36] but affects only the right to enforce such liability.[37]

[§ 2904] B. How Office or Liability Assumed—1. Intermeddling in General. A person makes himself chargeable as executor de son tort by acts of such a character as indicate that he is possessed of authority to administer upon the estate.[38] So, if a debtor or a stranger takes the goods of a decedent or in any way intermeddles with them, injuriously to the interests of the estate, he becomes an executor de son tort and is chargeable accordingly,[39] and persons who aid and abet or take part in the intermeddling,[40] or who are in collusion with the intermeddler,[41] may also be held liable.

Intermeddling may consist in collecting or taking possession of the assets,[42] selling the property of the estate,[43] paying out money of the estate, in settlement of debts or otherwise,[44] or any acts which are of the character which usually evince a legal control,[45] such as using the property as one's own,[46] wasting it,[47] carrying on decedent's business,[48] or undertaking to distribute decedent's property under a trust fraudulently created by him.[49] It is necessary, however, to constitute such intermeddling as will make one an executor de son tort, that he should take possession or some control of decedent's property,[50] and where this element is lacking, the mere performance of acts which are of such nature as an executor or administrator would do cannot make one chargeable as executor de son tort.[51]

One who acts as administrator under void letters of administration becomes an executor de son tort,[52] but an administrator whose letters are revoked on discovery of a will cannot be treated as an executor de son tort.[53]

Intermeddling with real estate will not constitute a person executor de son tort.[54] But as a mortgage is personalty and goes to the administrator of the

mortgagee, the heirs of a mortgagee who enter the mortgaged premises to foreclose and take the rents and profits thereof are intermeddlers with the personal property of the estate of the deceased and executors in their own wrong and are liable for the amounts they have received.[55]

[§ 2905] 2. Acts Done in Good Faith or under Color of Right. In order for a person's acts to charge him as an executor de son tort, they must show an intention on his part to take upon himself the exercise of those duties which appertain to the office of the legal representative alone.[56] If it clearly appears that the person sought to be charged was merely acting in good faith in attempting to protect his own rights, or under color of authority, he will not as a general rule be charged as executor de son tort.[57] Thus a person will not be charged as executor de son tort where he comes into possession of assets lawfully or with the consent of the rightful administrator,[58] or takes or retains possession of property under color of title in good faith believing his right to be superior to that of the lawful administrator, although his title proves indefensible.[59] But even though one has some color of authority to intermeddle with the goods of a decedent, he becomes executor de son tort if he exceeds his authority,[60] and a wrongful retention of property of the estate may make one an executor de son tort, although his original possession was lawful.[61]

[§ 2906] 3. Acts of Kindness and Charity. In order to establish the liability of an executor de son tort the intermeddling must be of an illegal character.[62] Mere acts of kindness and charity, such as directing the funeral, the payment of funeral expenses, protecting the estate from loss or waste by locking up the goods, feeding the stock, and the like, providing for children, and other acts of a similar character, do not render one chargeable as executor de son tort.[63] But the exemption from liability extends only to acts of this character,[64] and one who takes over the entire estate for arrangement and distribution, including everything in substance that an administrator would be bound to do, may be charged as executor de son tort.[65]

"There are other acts equivocal in their character, and such as are ordinarily performed by an executor, which, when explained, as they may always be, will appear to be mere acts of kindness and charity, and such as will not subject a stranger to the actions of creditors; such as locking up and preserving the goods, ordering the funeral obsequies, making a schedule of assets, feeding the cattle, repairing the houses, etc. All these, and perhaps many other acts, may be necessary for the comfort of the family and the preservation of the estate, before a will can be found and proved, and before administration can, with propriety, be commenced." Bacon v. Parker, 12 Conn. 212, 216.

[a] "Giving directions for the funeral is only an act of charity, and will not make a man executor. God forbid, it should; for then the deceased could not be buried by any one from the apprehension of being involved as executor." Harrison v. Rowley, 4 Ves. Jr. 212, 216, 31 Reprint 110.

[c] If the estate is insufficient to pay the funeral expenses in full, a debtor of the estate who applies the whole amount of the debt to the payment in full of one item of the funeral expenses, leaving the balance unpaid, becomes liable as executor de son tort to the persons holding claims against the estate for the unpaid items, to the extent of their prorata shares of the sums paid out. Bennett v. Ives, 30 Conn. 329.

[a] In a wild and unsettled region where there is no organized civil government a greater latitude may be allowed as to acts which may be performed without subjecting one to liability as executor de son tort than would be the case in a regularly organized community. Graves v. Poage, 17 Mo. 91.

[§ 2907] 4. Possession of Property Transferred to Holder by Decedent. One cannot be charged as an executor de son tort because of his possession of property sold to him by the decedent, where the sale was a bona fide one, coupled with an actual transfer of possession,[66] or where the property sold was exempt from execution in the hands of decedent.[67] But it is very generally considered that one who holds property under a gift or transfer which is void as against the creditors of the deceased donor or seller, may, so far as the defrauded creditors are concerned, be regarded as an executor de son tort,[68] although the contrary view has been asserted.[69] An assignee for the benefit of creditors does not become an executor de son tort because of acts done in good faith under the assignment after the death of the assignor, although the assignment was void because it was not executed in accordance with the requirements of law.[70]

[§ 2908] 5. Acts of Foreign Executor or Administrator. It has been held that an executor or administrator appointed or qualified in one state may be held liable as executor de son tort if he assumes possession or control of the assets of decedent in another state or country in which letters have not been issued to him,[71] but this has been denied on the ground that such representative is not a stranger to the property and cannot be an intermeddler.[72] Where an administrator collects assets in the state where administration was granted, and takes them into another state, he cannot be regarded as an executor de son tort in such other state.[73]

[§ 2909] 6. Acts Done as Agent or Servant of Another—a. Of Decedent. An agent who continues to act under his agency after the death of his principal may be held liable as an executor de son tort of the principal,[74] unless his agency is coupled with an interest in the goods in his possession as agent, and he acts to protect himself,[75] and the same rule applies to a subagent who continues to act after having been notified by the agent that the agency has terminated by the death of the principal.[76]

[§ 2910] b. Of Rightful Executor. One cannot be charged as executor de son tort because of acts done as agent for the rightful executor,[77] even though such acts are done before the will has been proved;[78] but it is otherwise as to acts of such an agent done after the death of the executor whose agent he was.[79]

[§ 2911] c. Of Distributees. One who acts as agent of the distributees in connection with the property of the estate does not thereby become an executor de son tort, where there are no creditors of the estate.[80]

[§ 2912] d. Of Executor De Son Tort. It has been held that one cannot be charged as an executor de son tort because of acts done by him as a mere agent or servant of an intermeddler,[81] at least, where he was not cognizant of the unlawfulness of what was being done,[82] where the acts were of such nature that they would not have rendered the principal liable had he performed them himself,[83] or where the acts done as agent are legalized by a subsequent grant of administration to the principal.[84] But on the other hand there is authority for the view that acts done as the agent or servant of an executor de son tort may render the actor himself liable as an executor de son tort,[85] and he cannot relieve himself of liability as such by delivering the assets received by him to his princi-

[§ 2913] 7. Acts of Surviving Spouse, Heirs, or Devisees. The acts of a surviving spouse, heir, or devisee of the decedent, done in good faith, are treated with indulgence, especially if the estate gains advantage rather than disadvantage therefrom, and the assets are duly accounted for;[87] but acts done in bad faith, injurious to the interests of the estate or with proceeds unaccounted for, may subject one to liability as executor de son tort, notwithstanding the relationship borne to decedent.[88]

[§ 2914] 8. Dealings with Executor De Son Tort. An innocent purchaser of property from the executor de son tort cannot be held to the liability of his vendor;[89] and there is authority for the doctrine that even a purchaser from an executor de son tort with notice of his vendor's lack of authority does not thereby become himself an executor de son tort and chargeable as such as if he had directly intermeddled with the property,[90] although a contrary view has been asserted.[91] A creditor of the estate who obtains payment of his debt from an executor de son tort does not thereby become himself an executor de son tort.[92]

[§ 2915] 9. Administration on Estate of Executor De Son Tort. That a person who administers upon the estate of an executor de son tort thereby makes himself liable as executor de son tort of the original decedent has been both asserted[93] and denied.[94]

[§ 2916] 10. Intermeddling with Partnership Assets. One who intermeddles with the assets of a partnership after the death of a member of the firm is usually held liable to account to the surviving partner,[95] and hence cannot be properly regarded as an executor de son tort of the deceased partner.[96] Where a plaintiff filed a bill for an account against defendant as executor de son tort of his deceased partner, as well as in his character of surviving partner, it was held that defendant, having answered, must answer fully in both capacities.[97]

[§ 2917] 11. Effect of Existence of Rightful Representative. As a general rule an intermeddling with decedent's goods will not make one liable as an executor de son tort in a suit by creditors if there is an executor or administrator already appointed, for in such case the intermeddler is accountable to the lawful representative.[98] If, however, acts have been performed for which a person

[a] To this rule there are exceptions.—(1) Thus, where a stranger takes decedent's goods, and, claiming to be executor, pays or receives debts or pays legacies or otherwise does those acts which none but an executor can do, in which case he becomes executor de son tort, although there is a rightful executor, or administration has been duly granted. Ward v. Bevill, 10 Ala. 197, 44 AmD 478; State v. Rogers, 1 Del. 120 note a; Howland v. Dews, R. M. Charlt. (Ga.) 383; Foster v. Nowlin, 4 Mo. 18; Anonymous, 1 Salk. 313, 91 Reprint 276. (2) So also if a

cannot be responsible to the rightful administrator but which have interfered with the estate to the injury of creditors alone, he may still be liable as executor de son tort.[99] Thus, a fraudulent grantee of the decedent may be held as executor de son tort at the suit of creditors, in jurisdictions where an action to set aside the transfer could not be brought by the executor or administrator.[1] The fact that there is a lawful representative in one state does not prevent an intermeddler in another state being held liable as an executor de son tort,[2] although it has been considered that one who acts in one state with the consent of the executor in another state ought not to be held liable.[3]

[§ 2918] C. Rights and Liabilities—1. In General.[4] An executor de son tort is subject to all the liabilities of an ordinary executor or administrator without being entitled to any of his privileges,[5] but although he cannot obtain any personal advantage from his intermeddling, he can use proper means to protect the assets of the estate.[6] In his dealings with respect to the estate, he is held to such diligence as prudent men ordinarily bestow on their own affairs.[7] Accordingly it has been held that, where his negligence in failing to collect securities at maturity causes a loss to the estate, he is liable for such loss,[8] although there is also authority for the view that he cannot enforce the collection of notes due the estate and therefore cannot be sued for a failure to do so.[9] Where defendant, who undertook to administer without authority, obtained from plaintiff, who was entitled to share in the estate, an unfair settlement, because of failure to make a full and fair report of the property of the estate, the settlement should be deemed fraudulent, although defendant sincerely believed that plaintiff had no rights.[10]

Estoppel to deny representative character. Persons who presume without authority to administer an estate and who claim fully to have administered are estopped, in a proceeding for an accounting, from denying their representative character or their liability to account accordingly.[11]

Intermeddling in another state. Where one has intermeddled in an estate in one state by taking possession of its property as an administrator might, he can be compelled, on making an appearance in court in another state, the creditors not interfering, to account to the heirs.[12]

The death of an executor de son tort does not relieve his estate of liability for his intermeddling during his lifetime.[13]

Where there are two executors de son tort, one of them cannot be held liable for a loss resulting from the negligence of the other in which he did not participate,[14] although he may be held liable for the acts of the other which he authorized or directed.[15]

An executor de son tort of a duly constituted executor is liable at common law in respect of the debts of the original testator.[16]

An executor de son tort of an executor de son tort has been held to represent the first testator,[17] and where property was held by the first testator in trust the statute of limitations does not begin to run in respect to such property in favor of the executor de son tort of the person who was executor de son tort of the first testator, until he has termi-person gets the goods of a decedent into his hands before administration is granted he remains chargeable as executor de son tort afterward, unless he delivers the goods to the rightful administrator before an action is brought. nated the relation by converting the trust property to his own use.[18] An executor of an executor de son tort is not liable for a breach of contract committed by the original testator, although the executor de son tort had actually possessed himself of the property in respect to which the contract was made.[19]

Statutory penalty. The rule of strict construction is applied to statutes providing a penalty for intermeddling with the estate of a decedent.[20]

Criminal liability for intermeddling with the estate of a decedent is sometimes imposed by statute.[21]

[§ 2919] 2. Extent of Liability. An executor de son tort is liable for the value of the property taken and used by him,[22] but can be charged only with what actually came into his hands,[23] unless, as is sometimes the case, a greater liability is imposed by statute.[24]

Interest. An executor de son tort is liable for interest from the time he took possession of the assets [25] at the highest legal rate.[26]

[§ 2920] 3. Who May Enforce Liability. The lawful executor or administrator is as a general rule the proper person to enforce the liability of an executor de son tort.[27] At common law an executor de son tort may also be sued by creditors of decedent;[28] and it is held by some authorities that legatees or next of kin of decedent may enforce liability of an executor de son tort,[29] although the more generally accepted view is that they have no such right,[30] at least, while there are unpaid debts of decedent.[31] Under modern statutes in a number of states the liability of an executor de son tort can be enforced only by the personal representative of decedent,[32] but the right to enforce such liability has also been conferred by statute on heirs and legatees.[33]

An estoppel to enforce liability as executor de son tort may arise from having requested[34] or consented to[35] the acts which are claimed to have constituted intermeddling.

[§ 2921] 4. Effect of Delivery of Assets to Rightful Representative. An executor de son tort may avoid liability by turning over to the rightful representative, before an action is brought against him, all the assets which had come into his hands;[36] but he cannot relieve himself by delivering over the effects to the rightful executor or administrator after an action has been brought.[37]

[§ 2922] D. Effect of Acts—1. How Far Binding on Lawful Representative. The true representative is bound by those acts of an executor de son tort which are lawful and such as the true representative would be bound to perform in the due course of administration,[38] but not by any other acts of the intermeddler.[39]

With respect to the statute of limitations an executor de son tort cannot, by a payment, acknowledgment, or any other act, interrupt the running of the statute or waive the bar thereof, as against the rightful representative,[40] although he may by such acts render himself personally answerable for the debt.[41]

[§ 2923] 2. Sales. A purchaser from an executor de son tort gets no better title than his vendor had and therefore such a purchase, although bona fide, is no defense as against the rightful administrator seeking to recover in trespass or trover.[42] Nevertheless a bona fide purchaser at a public sale acquires at least a possession and a right of possession which he can maintain against all the world

[a] That the executor de son tort afterward paid debts (1) of the estate does not make the sale valid so as to pass title to a purchaser with notice. Roumfort v. McAlarney, 82 Pa. 193. (2) If an executor de son tort takes property and pays debts with it, the rightful executor cannot disturb the purchaser, because if he could recover, the property would have to be disposed of to pay the debts. [b] A creditor who receives goods in payment (1) of his debts from an executor de son tort cannot protect his possession against an action of trover by the lawful administrator. Mountford v. Gibson, 4 East 441, 102 Reprint 900. (2) A sale by an executor de son tort of goods of the estate to a creditor of the estate, in payment of his claim, would give him a good title. Rockwell v. except the rightful administrator,[43] and as against him the purchaser acquires an actual possession of which he cannot be lawfully deprived except by suit.[44] A purchaser on credit from an executor de son tort can defend against an action by the vendor for the price by showing that he has paid a part thereof to the legally appointed administrator on demand and given his note to the administrator for the balance.[45]

[§ 2924] 3. Effect of Subsequent Issue of Letters to Executors De Son Tort. The fact that a person named as executor or entitled to administer upon an estate has, by intermeddling, rendered himself executor de son tort does not preclude him from subsequently taking out letters testamentary or of administration.[46] When he does take out such letters, they relate back so as to validate all acts previously done by him in the interest of the estate,[47] but previous acts which were to the prejudice of the estate are not validated.[48] A payment to the executor de son tort binds the estate, if he is subsequently granted letters;[49] and it has been held that a judgment against an executor de son tort will be valid against him after he has regularly administered and will bind the estate unless fraud or collusion is shown.[50]

Contracts made by an executor de son tort before letters testamentary or of administration were issued to him may thereafter be ratified by him either expressly[51] or impliedly,[52] and when ratified may be enforced.[53] But it has also been held that it may repudiate an agreement previously made by him.[54]

A person who is sued as executor de son tort cannot defeat the action by taking out letters pending the suit.[55]

Nature of liability. Where one who has wrongfully converted personalty of an unrepresented estate is appointed and qualifies as administrator, he cannot be held liable, as executor de son tort, for prior conduct, but becomes liable for proper administration of the estate as administrator.[56]

[§ 2925] E. Actions and Remedies—1. Right of Action—a. By Executor De Son Tort. It is usually held that an administrator de son tort cannot as such bring any action,[57] although it has

[d] On the other hand it has been held that the fact that the executor de son tort subsequently administered the estate did not give title to a person who bought from him before he was a rightful administrator. Wilson v. Hudson, 4 Del. 168, 169 ("It seems to be settled, that acts done by an administrator de son tort, will not bind the same person as rightful executor; any more than they would bind a third person who should become administrator. . . . If it were otherwise it would be in the power of any creditor, combining with the widow, as in this case, though all by the act becoming administrators de son tort, to administer the goods and defraud other creditors. The only safe rule is to hold that such sale does not change the property, and that the person afterwards becoming lawful administrator, can recover it"). See also Doe v. [b] Payment without allowance by court.—Under a statute providing that on every settlement the administrator shall show that every claim for which disbursements have been made has been allowed by the court, an intermeddler who pays debts of decedent without such an allowance, and who is subsequently appointed administrator, is not entitled, over the objections of the heirs, to credit in his final settlement for the debts so paid, even though it is admitted by the heirs that such debts were valid and would have been allowed by the court if presented and proved according to law. [§ 2926] b. Against Executor De Son Tort. An executor de son tort may be sued generally as executor,[60] or specifically as executor de son tort.[61]

[§ 2927] 2. Nature and Form of Action—a. In General. It has been held in Canada that the court cannot, in the same proceeding, brought by a creditor of the decedent, adjudge that defendant is an executor de son tort and also give judgment against him as such for the amount claimed by plaintiff.[62] Under the Georgia statute the nature of a suit against an executor de son tort is limited to a personal action against wrongdoer, and is not directed against the estate itself, but is merely for double the value of property illegally possessed or converted, and cannot properly be brought on the original obligation.[63]

[§ 2928] b. Action at Law. The rightful administrator may pursue the executor de son tort in a court of law either by trespass for unlawfully taking the goods of the intestate,[64] or by trover for their conversion;[65] and debt has been held a proper form of action by a creditor in certain cases.[66] An action against an executor de son tort by a creditor has been held to be founded on contract and not on tort,[67] and it has also been held that if a person sells the goods of an estate before administration is granted and receives the money therefor, an administrator subsequently appointed may sue him in trover for conversion,[68] or waive the tort and bring assumpsit for money had and received.[69]

[§ 2929] c. Suit in Equity. The rule that a creditor may come into a court of chancery against a personal representative has been recognized as applying to an executor de son tort,[70] although the contrary view has also been asserted,[71] on the ground that there is a plain and adequate remedy at law.[72] If the person sought to be charged as executor de son tort holds the property in question under a fraudulent conveyance, the remedy in equity for the creditor is particularly proper, for the rightful representative is bound by decedent's fraud.[73] Bills in chancery against executors de son tort by rightful personal representatives,[74] and by heirs and distributees[75] have also been sustained.

[§ 2930] d. Probate Proceedings. An executor de son tort cannot be cited to account in a probate court.[76]

[§ 2931] 3. Conditions Precedent. In Louisiana it was formerly necessary that a person who had taken unauthorized possession of the effects of a vacant succession or a part thereof, with intent to convert the same to his own use, should be criminally prosecuted and convicted for such action, before a creditor of the succession could institute a suit to hold such person liable for a debt due him by the succession;[77] but this requirement no longer obtains.[78]

[§ 2932] 4. Time to Sue and Limitations. A statute protecting personal representatives from suit until after the expiration of a certain time does not apply to executors de son tort, but they may be sued immediately after intermeddling.[79] An action may be brought against an executor de son tort, if a cause of action existed against his decedent, at any time until the action is barred by the lapse of the statutory time after a lawful grant of administration.[80] Where the relationship of decedent to another was such that the statute of limitations would not run in decedent's favor, it will not run in favor of his executor de son tort.[81]

[§ 2933] 5. Defenses. Although an executor de son tort cannot by his own wrongful act acquire any benefit,[82] yet he is protected in all acts not for his own benefit which a rightful executor might do,[83] and accordingly he may show that he has applied either the whole amount or some part of the assets that came into his hands to the purposes to which it would have been the duty of a rightful executor or administrator to apply it.[84] Where a creditor of a deceased grantor brings a bill in equity against a fraudulent or voluntary grantee on the theory that he is an executor de son tort, defendant may set up any defense which might be made by the decedent himself, if living, or by his rightful personal representative.[85] If one without authority sells the goods of an estate and receives the money therefor, it is no defense to an action for its recovery, instituted against him by the administrator, that the sale was void, and vested no title in the purchaser.[86] In an action by decedent's widow as his administratrix to recover against defendant for the conversion of property of the estate, defendant may show that he acted under the direction of the widow, before her appointment as administratrix and that he used the proceeds of the property in payment of debts of the estate.[87] But where at the death of an intestate one present took possession of the cash on hand with a view to its safekeeping, it was held that an action for money had and received would lie by the administrator, although he was present at the time of the taking of the money and made no objection.[88]

[§ 2934] 6. Set-Off. Since a set-off to a debt is allowed simply to avoid a cross action, an executor de son tort cannot, in an action by a creditor, set off a debt due from such creditor to decedent.[89] The amount expended by an executor de son tort in paying the just debts of decedent may be set off against his liability for intermeddling,[90] but it is incumbent upon him to show that he has applied the assets which have come into his hands in the same manner in which they would have been lawfully applied by a rightful representative,[91] and he will be allowed no set-off or credit if the debts which he has discharged were not legal claims against the estate.[92] Payments to creditors in excess of their pro rata shares will protect the executor de son tort only to the extent of the amount which such creditors should have received.[93] The executor de son tort is not entitled to any set-off by reason of the application of assets to his own claim against decedent,[94] or to the payment of a legacy given him by the will.[95] In an action by the distributees, the statutory allowance paid to the widow may be set off.[96]

[§ 2935] 7. Venue. An executor de son tort is liable to be sued in any jurisdiction where he is found with property of decedent.[97]

[§ 2936] 8. Parties. It has been held that a bill cannot be maintained by distributees against an executor de son tort who has sold property of decedent, to have an account and obtain a decree for the proceeds, unless the rightful personal representative is a party plaintiff or defendant.[98] A laborer may, however, enforce his lien on crops in the hands of a wrongdoer after the death of his employer, without bringing in the personal representation of such employer.[99] The distributees are not necessary parties to a bill by a creditor against an executor de son tort who is a fraudulent purchaser.[1] If there is a lawful executor, he and the executor de son tort may be joined in an action by a creditor.[2] An executor de son tort is not a proper party defendant to a bill for relief against a judgment at law in favor of decedent.[3] On the death of a defendant in an action of debt a summons may issue to his executor de son tort to appear and defend the action, if there is no legal executor or administrator.[4]

[§ 2937] 9. Pleading—a. Complaint, Declaration, or Petition. The rule as usually laid down in an action against an executor de son tort the complaint or declaration should charge him as executor generally,[5] but it has also been held sufficient for a creditor of decedent, suing the executor de son tort, to allege his intermeddling without lawful appointment and possession of decedent's goods, and pray for judgment.[6] A complaint not alleging that defendant came into possession of decedent's property unlawfully, or showing that he was an intermeddler in the estate, is insufficient to charge him as an executor de son tort,[7] but in an action by distributees it is not necessary to allege that no debts are due by the estate.[8] The complaint of a creditor should allege as nearly as possible the amount of decedent's money or property in the hands of defendant,[9] and affirmatively show that decedent's creditors were entitled to have the property go into the hands of an administrator.[10] A petition alleging that decedent left property in possession of a certain person as depositary, that such person assumed the control and management of the property until he surrendered the same to another person, and that such other person continued in control and management until he turned over the property to a third person who voluntarily assumed the management of the same, states a cause of action against the last custodian of the property only in the absence of an allegation that he is insolvent or unable to respond to any judgment which may be rendered against him.[11]

In a suit for a penalty under a statute which provides that no person shall enter upon the administration of any decedent's estate until he has obtained letters therefor, under a prescribed penalty, the complaint must state that defendant entered on the administration of the estate without obtaining letters.[12]

An amendment of the complaint, to conform to the evidence, which does not substantially change the claim or present any new issue, will be allowed.[13]

[§ 2938] b. Plea or Answer. One sued as executor de son tort may plead ne unques executor,[14] plene administravit,[15] plene administravit præter,[16] or non assumpsit.[17] Two or more of these pleas may be joined,[18] and the statute of limitations may be pleaded along with the other pleas.[19] The pleading of other pleas in addition to ne unques executor is not an admission by defendant that he is liable as executor of his own wrong.[20] Where one who has been executor de son tort takes out letters of administration and is afterward sued as executor de son tort he may plead in abatement that he is administrator and not executor,[21] but where one who has been sued as executor de son tort takes out administration pending suit he cannot plead in abatement that he is administrator and not executor.[22] The application of the assets to the payment of debts is merely matter of defense;[23] it cannot be pleaded in bar of an action by the lawful representative,[24] nor is it necessary that it should be set up as a counterclaim.[25] A plea to an action by a creditor that, since the institution of the suit, an administrator had been appointed is bad unless it contains an averment that the assets in defendant's hands had been delivered to the administrator either before or after the institution of the action.[26] A plea in abatement comes too late after the cause has been tried on defendant's plea of the general issue and the facts have been found by the court and when a legal judgment is impending.[27]

[§ 2939] 10. Evidence. An executor de son tort who asserts in defense the payment of debts of decedent has the burden of showing the existence and validity of such debts as enforceable claims against the estate.[28] Evidence is admissible to show that a defendant is an executor de son tort, although it is not so charged in the pleadings.[29] Payment of legitimate expenses may be shown.[30] In an action against a person alleged to be the fraudulent purchaser of decedent and therefore his executor de son tort, a statement made by the vendor after the sale of the property and while it still remained in his possession that the property was his is admissible.[31] Records of judgments against decedent at the time he made the alleged fraudulent sale are admissible to show his indebtedness at the time.[32] Although a defendant sued as executor de son tort may give in evidence under the general issue payments of decedent's debts, yet his book of original entries is inadmissible to prove the payment of the debts.[33] Evidence to charge a person as executor de son tort need not be sufficient to warrant a conviction of felony.[34]

[§ 2940] 11. Trial. Whether a person is an executor de son tort is partly a question of law and partly a question of fact.[35] The court determines what state of facts will constitute a person executor of his own wrong,[36] and the jury determines whether such facts exist in the particular case.[37]

[§ 2941] 12. Verdict. When defendant pleads plene administravit and the issue is determined against him, the verdict should find how much property came into his hands, how much he lawfully administered, how much remains, and its value.[38]

[§ 2942] 13. Judgment. In an action against an executor de son tort on a debt of decedent, the proper judgment at common law was that plaintiff recover the debt and costs to be levied of decedent's assets if defendant has so much, but if not, then of defendant's own goods.[39] But a distinction has been made, based on the plea interposed, to the effect that if defendant pleads ne unques executor and the issue is determined against him, he should be charged with the whole debt de bonis propriis,[40] while if he pleads plene administravit, he should be charged only with the assets that came into his hands.[41] Statutes sometimes preclude any judgment against the administrator de bonis non in such form as to impose on him a liability in excess of the value of the assets received by him[42] or such value with an added penalty of a certain percentage thereof.[43] It is sufficient that the judgment is entered and execution issued against defendant as executor and not as executor de son tort.[44] Judgment should be given to plaintiff for the full amount of his debt, although the estate is insolvent.[45]

Judgment by default should not be rendered against an executor de son tort as garnishee for the debt of a distributee, where it does not appear that there has been a settlement, which alone can determine whether anything will be coming to the distributee.[46]

For individual debt. Goods of a decedent in the possession of an executor de son tort are not subject to be seized for the latter's individual debts.[51]

EXECUTORSHIP EXPENSES. Testamentary expenses;[1] expenses incident to the proper performance of the duty of the executor in the same way as testamentary expenses are, neither more nor less.[2]

EXECUTORY.[3] That which remains to be carried into operation or effect; incomplete; depending upon a future performance or event.[4]

EXECUTORY PROCESS. In Louisiana, a term applied to an order of seizure and sale when a mortgage imports a confession of judgment.[5] It is a summary proceeding, and issues without citation to the adverse party,[6] being said to be, in substance, a decree of foreclosure and sale.[7]

EXECUTRIX.[8]

EXEMPLA ILLUSTRANT, NON RESTRINGUNT, LEGEM.[10]

EXEMPLA NON RESTINGUNT REGULAM, SED LOQUUNTUR DE CASIBUS CREBRIORIBUS.[11]

EXEMPLARY.[12] Such as may serve for a warning to others; such as may deter from wrongdoing.[13]

EXEMPLIFICATION.[14] When used in a legal sense the word means a copy or transcript attested to be correct by the seal of an officer having custody of the original;[15] a copy accompanied by a certificate of the proceedings necessary to be taken in order to authorize the same to be entered of record;[16] a perfect copy of a record or office book, so far as relates to the matter in question.[17]

EXEMPLI GRATIA. Literally "For the purpose of example."[18]

EXEMPT.[19] The term is not a technical one but is a plain English word.[20]

As a noun. A person who is free from any charge, burden, or duty;[21] not liable to, etc.;[22] one who is excused from duty.[23]

As a verb. To excuse;[24] to clear;[25] to free;[26] to free from obligation;[27] to grant immunity to;[28] to release;[29] to relieve from some requisition, etc., to which others are subject;[30] to take out of or from, and in its ordinary signification to free from, not be subject to any service or burden to which others are made liable;[31] to except or excuse from some burdensome condition or obligation or the operation of some law to which others are subject.[32]

Exempted. Free;[33] free, clear, or released as from some liability, restriction, or burden affecting other persons;[34] not liable;[35] not subject to;[36] precluded from being chargeable;[37] released from some liability which others are subject to.[38] In military circles, the word is sometimes used in the sense of "discharged" or "relieved from."[39]
